Nearly five per cent of the houses in Andran alone were in ruins, all of Norma Catherine seemed to be burning, with a loss of six million dead, and the rest without shelter and destitute of the necessities of life, and refused aid by the Glandelinians in possession, and so giving no means whatever to save them. Everything in the way of corps was either in the hands of the besieging armies or destroyed by enemies to prevent their retaining them, big explosions erupted like exploded volcanoes, killing millions of persons per explosion, and unless the siege incurred to a speedy finish there will be exceedingly great suffering, and the whole world is a ready needing assistance itself as the Aronburg situation causes sorrow all over. General Garrison is overworked and needs some one to relieve him for a period of four months and his losses are simply more dreadful than any dare exaggerate. The people of Vivian Wickey hold prisoners by the enemy and refused sufficient aid and need and must have assistance. The nation knowing the horror should supply money to help the besiegers capture Vivian Wickey. Clothing even for the army is badly needed. Hundreds of thousands of men and child slaves in Andran are without a change in their misery despite the progress of the siege and are suffering more on account of the siege. Some better idea may be had of the distress when it is known that box cars outside the main christian lines arching impromptu improvised as houses and hay for bedding by soldiers themselves. Only fourteen houses in the once fair little town of Jen in Vivian is standing, Sunbeam Creek, the paradise park regions of Vivian Wickey is a thousand charnel hells, and buildings in Julio Gallo also are badly damaged. The damage near Lieghburg Landing was not less than one hundred million dollars but the news from there is too disheartening to repeat. The country districts were strewn with corpses on account of the Zangustopolis. Zangustopolis horror. The prairies around Jennie Vivian are dotted with the bodies of the dead, and a vast crater lies ten miles east of Jennie Vivian dug by some tremendous explosion early in the siege. Scores unburied there are mere skeletons for it was no doubt the bodies had been too badly decomposed to be handled and the water of the crater is too deep for any navigation.

A terrible pestilence is feared from the millions of decomposing animal matter lying everywhere. The stench is something awful. Disinfecting material is all so badly needed. Damage to railroads outside of Vivian, okay on account of the siege was about five hundred million dollars. Damage to all lines of telegraph, telephone, and others outside of Vivian, okay was fifty million dollars. Damage to crops by the enemy to prevent it falling into the hands of the besiegers was about thirty three million dollars. Damage to all stock was great, countless thousands of horses having perished like the soldiers in battle. In the town of Brazoria one of the outpost places used by the Angelinians and whose houses were changed into strong fortifications, there was hardly a building left standing and its defenders had withdrawn to main lines. All farming fences were gone, and the devastation from shell fire was complete. Even many large and expensive grain elevators along the rivers, and sugar refineries, refineries were wrecked by the enemy. All child slaves still building a wage blown up by the enemy and many children not taken by the enemy back to Vivian, okay killed.

On one large abandoned child slave plantation outside the works of a Aurandocallio a short distance from the terrible Gertrude Angelina fortifications many child slaves were found dead. The small abandoned villages near fortress Lucille, Jackson also abandoned by the foe were completely destroyed as they retreated and over twenty hundred sick child slaves and injured ones from overwork were either killed or left to die in the burning buildings, most of the bodies having been recovered by the Angelinians themselves. Every child slave place in that part of the section was destroyed by the retreating enemy, and there was great suffering from or among the many child slaves who were left behind and who fortunately escaped the awful death. There was also much destruction among the child slaves abandoned.

In a Christian fortification, this fortification though a strong one was one of the most exposed to the Christian guns, and was wholly destroyed by the Christian gunners before the enemy would go out of it. The child slaves so hastily abandoned were without shelter and only by a miracle escaped death or injuries during the terrible artillery battle. Their food supplies were provided by the Angelinians who rescued them. The Angelinian authorities also heard from the plantations where several hundred of the most expensive child slaves had been employed. Every building in the plantation was blown to pieces by the enemy mining them and the loss to this property aggregated three million five hundred thousand dollars. Fifteen of the children were caught under the timbers of a falling building before they could get out and killed. Over a hundred others were injured. The well children were taken by the retreating enemy and the others left behind. In addition to the loss on these buildings the entire cane crop belonging to the besieged was destroyed as well as on other fortified plantations in that section. Seven child slaves were killed by the retreating enemy at Angelonia, which was also destroyed by fire. In the neighborhood of the same fortress five Angelinians were killed, and fifty wounded, when struck down by grape shot while driving child slaves ahead of them. The child slaves were not harmed and escaped. The loss of life among the retreating Angelinians in that immediate section far exceeded the millions. The search for child slave victims at Sea Brook, forti fortress captured by the Angelinians resulted in fifty thousand Angelinian soldiers dead being found but no slaves. This fort was a favorite residing place for the Angelinian Garrison when first in possession before the capture of Vivian, okay by the enemy, and had at this time been filled with soldiers and child slaves when the shell storm started. There were many soldiers killed but no child slaves were found.

Marcocuan situated near the mouth of the Mic-Hollet or Run a made the Christian armies confronting it ask for aid. Over one half of their encampments, mostly of barracks was destroyed by the shelling from the fortress and reports from the adjacent country showed that many soldiers were killed while at their guns. Eleven child slaves employed on a rebel plantation in the region of fortress Matagorda were killed by the collapse of a building from the concussion of so many cannons in which they had sought refuge from the artillery storm of both sides. The fortress of Matagorda, situated near Fortress Silver Bell was in the forefront of the Christian artillery attack.

Se several Angelinian generals were killed here General Ganey and Elliot, and several others injured. Over fifty child slaves were killed near Fort Wharton, ten being killed on one plantation near the fortress. The fort resists though holding out suffered a loss of nearly all its barracks, and camps by shells, and three thousand Angelinians were killed there at their guns. There were many child slaves taken from the ruins every barracks but two being destroyed. The destitute child slaves were compelled to live out doors therefore and camp on the wet ground when the enemy could easily afford them better shelter. Out side of Fort Galveston, and Houstonia, the greatest suffering from the artillery storm upon Thumbelina and vicinity was between Galveston Port and Lake Angelina, inland, and on the coast of the Norma pun river mouth. This was caused by the storm of Zimmerman's batteries, and the bombardment of the fleets. There was no damage at the Corpus Christi fortress, Port Rockport, and Rockford or in that immediate section of the river coast, though some fierce attempts had been made to take them by storm. The Angelinians who suffered the worse on account of the four big bombardments of concentric Artillery were those of the river sections near Gertrude Angelina. The Angelinian rebel child slave masters and planters had every thing swept away by fire the beginning of the siege, and the bombardment of the Christian artillery upon Gertrude Angelina, to cover Norma capture, and the flood made by Angelinian engineers totally devastated every thing between the fort, leaving the Angelinians at this section in danger of starvation. An enormous acreage was planted in all kinds of crops and was almost ready for harvesting when the storm of guns and the floods laid everything low. At ports Wharton, Sugarland, Quintana, Waller Teller, Prairie View and many other defense works barely a barracks house was left standing, though the enemy held and defended the forts to the last. Many of the child slaves of male kind of old or young who were able were compelled to help man guns or bring in ammunition to repel the Christian artillery fire and other work, and the child slaves many of them repelled when they saw signs of an storming Christian infantry assault brewing. When the assault was made the Angelinians managed to pour over the works, and capture numerous soldiers and slaves combined and so fiercely did the enemy fight and resist the charge that when many prisoners were taken most of their clothing was gone, having been burned by flashes of gun powder or exploding cartridges. The child slaves were also found in a terrible condition. The loss of so many prisoners, barracks, and child slaves and such awful numbers in killed and wounded and of such horrible scenes and miles was a severe blow to the enemy. Livestocks also were greatly harmed. Five generals of the rebels were killed at Grantlin Point in the terrible battle there. General Mic-Henry of that division was the only one who survived, and came through the frightful battle exhausted and in a state of terrible nervousness indeed. The general reported to Stanek that the Angelinian forces mostly leading Abyssinkilians aided by Winkies, and Abiesaminians, assaulted so furiously that the most galling fire of gathling guns, and artillery and musketry would not stop their wild onrush. He declared that his division though the rear of one of the Angelinian assaults were driven out of the works and sought safety in the outer works of fortress Eddinta near Marcocallio. In endeavoring to rally the troops to greater efforts to resist that irresistible tide of Christian troops general Girdon Haventon took a Angelinian regimental flag and waved it but was struck down by a grape shot and killed. General Mic-Henryson then strove to get his guns out of reach of the accretion human tide wave in purple and hills he was ordering the guns to be sent to the rear under lash he was twice wounded by bullets and then killed by a musket ball in the head. General Lucy Anna in striving to bring a brigade of Winkie, Abiesaminians to the front to repel the Winkie Abyssinkilians was next killed by a piece of timber hurled at him by the explosion of grape, and next general Gaudon was mortally wounded in striving to regain the ground he had lost. Finally only two generals were in command of the shattered division. Finally with one rush the Abyssinkilians and other Angelinians gained the parapets and in the face of a sent scathing withering fire fairly hurled the rebels out of the works breaking the Angelinian insurgent line in twain, and turning its flank. General Glance took charge of one half of the line and started a withdrawal, while General Henry took charge of the other and still strove to repel the Nationals and drive back their insane efforts. The losses of the assailants was exorbitant but still they pressed on and general Glimin was killed as he also saved a flag to inspire his men on. General Mic-Henry however held to his own works and finally receiving reinforcements from Maracoeillo and Silverbell managed to repulse the Angelinians at last. It was a desperate conflict lasting all day and caused the glandelinians a loss of seven five thousand dead. At Surfside Junction the assault of the Angelinians almost turned the enemy under general quibble out of their works. The Angelinians had moved against the long redan in two directions, and the works were in greater danger on account of the heavy shells exploding around and above it. Only a few glandelinians could oppose such an attack with greater bravery than these, and even child slaves who were loyal to their masters went into the work and assisted the gunners in repelling the assault until losses even among them was dreadful. General Bellevue of the Angelinians in this section of the assault was killed but his batteries demolished every barracks of Fort Surfside Junction, and one unknown glandelinian general was killed there. Not a barracks was left at this point. Two big cars used by glandelinians as a place of defense was struck by a gang-gang shell and whirled along by the concussion for two hundred yards, where they collided with another line of box cars killing and wounded every one of the defenders. Another dead general, the destruction of all works and houses except one, and the destruction of two brigades of glandelinians was the record of the work of the bombardment at Arcadia gun. From fifty other sections of Thumbelina came reports that big assaulting christian columns had been wrecked or demolished, and the ground for miles strewn with dead and wounded. General Gillion of the Angelinians after this contest made a trip in disguise over the line of battle from Gertrude Angeline Point to Thumbelina point on foot August 13th and gave a graphic account of his perilous journey which was made under many difficulties.

"Twelve miles of railroad tracks and bridges near here are gone south of Gertrude Angeline." Said he. "I walked, waded and swam from the Gertrude Angeline Point, to Thumbelina Point sometimes under fire, and nothing could be seen in all of that section but death and desolation. The prairies were covered with wreckage of army material and I do not think I exaggerate when I say that not less than 55,000 artillery horses of the enemy are to be seen along the line of tracks south of Gertrude Angeline where the enemy repelled an assault of Abbeinnians. The enemy works along the railroad tracks are still held by them, yet the sight is the most terrible that I have witnessed. When I reached a section about two miles north of fortress Thumbelina and Maya I saw many wounded being gathered up on the battlefield and from that region until Virgin gun was reached, broken wagons, scattered arms, and dead bodies could be seen from the railroad tracks.

At Thumbelina point nothing is left. About a line of one hundred cars passenger on the Mic-Holleston and Jensen railroad are scattered over the prairie by great explosions and demolished, and their contents will no doubt prove a total loss of dead and wounded. The text of the message of sympathy received by Robert Vivian from the ruler of Abbeinnia Cannon Proclie was as follows:

"SACRAMENTO Abbeinnia. August the fourteenth, 1914.
Emperor of Angelina, Angelina Agahin;

I was as your best friend and side partner to convey to your Gracious Majesty the expression of my deep felt sympathy with the horrible misfortune that has befallen your town and harbor of Vivian Wickey with the long holding out of the most desperate enemy in history, and many other parts of the city and coast, and I mourn with you and all the people of Angelina and Abbeinnia over the terrible loss of lives among soldiers and the terrible loss of property caused by so many fearful battles, but the magnitude of the disaster is equalled by the indomitable spirits of the armies around Vivian Wickey, who in their two long years of hard and continued struggle with the adverse forces of the Angelinian rebels, have already proved themselves victorious with the captures of Julio Gallio, and Norma Catherine. I also sincerely hope that after it is fully recaptured that Vivian Wickey will rise again to new prosperity. In Abbeinnia soldiers are mobilizing anew and we will soon have more armies to repel our armies of base rebels and traitors fighting against us.

King Cannon Proclie."

General or King Robert Angeline Vivian replied;

His Imperial and Royal Majesty,
Cannon Proclie of Abbeinnia;

Your Majesty's message of condolence and sympathy is very grateful to the whole Angelinian people and governments and in their name as well as be on behalf of the many millions who have suffered bereavement and irreparable loss in the Aronburg glass disaster, I thank you most earnestly.

King Robert Vivian."

"Vivian Wickey must under any conditions hold out against all the efforts of the Nationals." Said the glandelinian News papers and general Mic-Alister Stano k.

At the first meeting of the glandelinian Congress in Mic - Whither after the futile effort to recapture Norma Catherine, for the purpose of bringing order out of such recent changes the only sentiment expressed "The glandelinian editorial says" as that the defenders of Vivian Wickey at Norma Catherine and Julio Gallio and also at Thumbelina and Gertrude Angeline had received an awful blow, a loss of life among the glandelinians defending those two places was unusually heavy, near as heavy as Atlanta is Atlanta and out-property loss on account of the cannon fire of the Nationals is appalling---so great that it probably would require several years to form anything like a correct estimate. With most sad and aching hearts but with resolute faces and hearts, the sentiment of the most tremendous meeting in the world was that out of the awful chances of wrecked property of Landinia and of horrible defeat and battles, Vivian Wickey and all her defending fortresses must hold out against all odds and not give way until ordered to by general Manley or by the main glandelinian authorities and that all efforts must be thrown in for the recapture of Norma Catherine and Julio Gallio. The sentiment was not that to bury the glandelinian glandelinian dead, and give up the city, but rather bury the dead so succor the defeated glandelinians, and then start resolutely to work to recover all lost ground. In many cases the work of rebuilding of damaged army barracks must begin over. In other cases the terrible destruction is only part in indeed. The sentiment was "Vivian Wickey, will, Vivian Wickey must survive the blow, and all of the glandelinian army and garrisons of the extensive Lucille, is men and yic-whithian fortifications full fill their most glorious destiny. Vivian Wickey shall hold out to the end. Norma Catherine and Julio Gallio shall rise again."

"If we glandelinians have lost all else, we still half life, and the future aid from Calverine through her secret tunnels, and it is toward that and that we must devote the energy of our lives to regain the two sections and hold hold out at all costs. We can never forget what we have suffered throughout the whole siege despite all aid sent through the so secret tunnels from Calverine, we cannot forget the many millions of our friends and beloved comrades, who found in the angry billows of war and carnage that destroyed them, a final resting place. But tears and grief must not make us forget our present duties. The blight and ruin which have destroyed our positions and Norma and Gallio are not we hope beyond repair, we must not for a single moment think Vivian Wickey is to be abandoned to the Federals because of one big disaster, however horrible that disaster and even defeat might have been. We still have all our big fortifications except Maya and so it is time for greater courage of the highest order. It is a time when all our garrisons and officers and scouts and artillery men and cavalry show the stuff that is in them, and we surely can make no loftier acknowledgement of the material sympathy which our own Nation is extending to us than to answer back that after we shall have buried all our dead soldiers and sent away to the stronger points our countless wounded, relieved the sufferings of the sick and our own destitute. We will bravely undertake the vast work of resuscitation of Norma Catherine and Julio Gallio and recuperation which lies before us in a manner which shall convince the world that we have the spirits to overcome misfortune defeat and recapture all our works in the face of the dogged christian foe before us. In this way we shall prove ourselves before the world worthy of the boundless barbarism which is being shown upon us by our own nation in the hour of herolt insolation, horror and shameful defeat. The sentiment voiced in a faculty of the vast gladiatorial army of the prestrated rebel garrison pretty accurately for they had begun to look around them and make plans now for the recovery of Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo, although it was many days after that before their own works were a lesson, and new batteries placed in the positions once occupied by the dismembered cannons.

One of the Argentinian newspaper correspondents who had unusual facilities for getting at the real status of affairs summed up the situation on the fifteenth of August, just a week after the second battle of Norma Catherine with Givianman army as follows:

The first week of the suffering of so many of the refugees had passed away with the full in the deadly conflict and the extent of the disaster which battle and flood brought to the two sections of Givian, was greater than it did when the blow had just been struck. What so many millions of the soldiers of both sides who fought the desperate battles so dead is almost as certain, and the money value of the damage to the property of the city is so great that no one can attempt to estimate it within the real amount. In one thing the effects of the flood caused by the exploding and blowing up of the levees and dams are irreparable. Water still covers over thirty million square feet of ground, that was for a part of Julio Gallo, but which can never be reclaimed from the river.

A line of redan fortified works three miles long along the southern section of Norma Catherine where the finest enemy barracks stood is now covered by the flood waters, the many buildings have their very foundations in the flood, although before the breaking of the levees by the besiegers it had stood many feet above the shore of the river. It seems as if this section of land once belonging to Givian, its key is gone forever. Like men stunned and dazed the survivors of the disaster have worked and struggled to bury their numerous dead, and to make preparations for a resumption of the action but for the inhabitants of the city itself it may be doubted whether they even yet may realize to the full extent what they all have lost or guess the suffering that has done for them when their survivors of leucocoma, and they began to miss their many friends and comrades and loved ones whose dead. It is certain now that however much our besieging lines have suffered everything will be made for restoration. Among the refugees from Givian, many of whom were owners of rich land, with every want provided for many may now be seen half a dead in the rear of the Christian lines, and entering the masses fortunate if their families are still intact to gather in the wreckage of their former homes. The men who were a few days before the outbreak of the siege were the owners of great businesses and the master of many servants may to day be seen with the soldiers in Norma Catherine working in the trying tasks of removing wreckage, and hauling away to burial the decayed and unrecognizable bodies of the many dead, under the direction of armed soldiers and officers and deputy sheriffs, who are there to see that the work is not slighted.

And around every one is terrible ruin. The many thousands of broken and shattered houses, the scattered articles of furniture, above all the big burning funeral pyres on which the bodies of many of the dead are being consumed, make the whole region a hell of horror even to those whose personal wants are being provided for.

The peril from the shelling and fire and flood was followed for those who survived by a peril of hunger, and a great peril of disease. Men came also a peril to life and property from the great horde of gladiatorial slaves who desperately desperate from the fall of Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo entered the Christian lines to do anything dangerous and cruel. The splendid response of the whole country and the world to the appeal of the besieging armies for help in breaking the enemy's resistance has also removed all danger from further suffering from hunger, and the prompt action of general Gower and of general Daniel Jones and others, and the big relief committees have re-established order and made the horrible scenes of the stripping of corpses of soldiers and the assaults on officers and men in possession of important army goods no longer possible. All of the captured portions of the city are still under martial law, and it will remain so until normal conditions otherwise have been restored. The danger of pestilence is still great however and indeed the fear that other scenes of thousands may fall victim to a terrible scourge of disease is gaining by strength and leading to a torrent of refugees and many of the men of the city who are crowding boats to get away to the Christian lines. Added to the danger of so many decomposing bodies both of soldiers and horses which still lie on the battlefields in ruined houses, and along the river shores is the danger also from so many of the unfinished sewers and closets in the city. Until yesterday it was impossible to flush anything in any part of the city not even the sewers on account of the lack of water and although the condition is now much better, there is much of evil still.

Sewers and many other diseases which may be bred under these awful conditions will not allow themselves for twenty days or longer at the earliest. Many of the doctors and physicians in the army and in the two sections of the city have issued many statements calculating to calm the apprehensions of the many rescued refugees in the matter. Among them is doctor Jordon, army health officer, who says that there is no great danger whatever. He refers to the gigantic battle of Manila, Atlanta just past, one of the bloodiest of the war entirely which covered the region for many miles with a large sea of dead soldiers of both sides, and even though so many bodies lay unburied for weeks there was no breeding of any kind of disease whatever. The work of clearing away much of the debris in the streets of Norma Catherine has indeed been carried on with a most fair degree of vigor, and it is surely expected from now on that it will be pushed much faster. The two million engineers and many non-combatants whom it has already been decided to bring in from the army itself for the work will I'm sure be able to take up the task without having to worry about the utmost safety of the remnants of their own property, which they may be compelled in their hasty flight from the fire of the enemy's guns to leave unprotected. We however must have both sections of Givian cleaned up at any cost whatever, and with the most greatest speed possible. If it is not done within the haste possible, and at the same time everything done well, there may be a pestilence, and if it once breaks out it will not be Givian,iskey alone who will suffer but the whole world. Such things spread like fire, and it is not only for the sake of this city the Christian armies and the country of Argentina but for other nations outside that I urge that above all things we want to stop it. The whole world and even Argentina has been most kind in its response to the appeal of the besiegers, and from what I hear food and disinfectants sufficient for all purposes at least, are being on the way. The whole world does not understand, it cannot understand, unless their own national people visit the remains of Givian,iskey, the awful scenes and destruction followed by awful destitution prevailing here.

Of all the poor refugee refugees here poor and rich not one has anything. None of them whatever could not furnish a single room in which to commence housekeeping. Housekeeping even though they had the money to rebuild their rooms. These people rich and poor have absolutely nothing, except what is given them by the relief committees. They are in a condition of absolute want, they lack everything, and save for the splendid generosity of the nation and the Christian world in general they would be utterly without hope. The many gangs of men are still frequently finding dead and badly decomposed bodies. Few of these relics of human lives can be recognized, and many of them are naked and without anything about them which would lead to identification. They are being disposed of as rapidly as possible, but the work is very offensive and the men engaged in it, cannot endure it steadily for any great length of time whatever.

Until pull them all out of the water as soon as they are seen floating on the surface and throw them into the flames. This is the order from every officer, and it is certainly carried out. The best work in this direction was done along a narrow river shore line on every section of the outskirts of both cities. During fourteen days straight the bodies were found continuously and even just at sunset seventeen hundred were found in the ruins of one house.

Dennis 0020

It is expected that more thousands will be found to morrow on the work gang that to day found seventeen hundred will clear up the awful debris where it is known that fifteen hundred people were killed. The soldiers who are in the city who have been here providing for order and helping in the work of a lean up the city have become exhausted and it has been necessary to relieve them every hour. General Craddock's 1st light infantry arrived also to day to take up the work. The awful exodus to the christian lines and other neighboring places is still going on continually. The sailboats steamers and transports across the rivers are crowded still to their fullest capacity, and they make as many round trips each day as is possible. No calamity in the history of the world approaches the horror of vivian wickey.

Sti Still Norma Catherine is a gigantic funeral pyre. Still from the wreckage men ascend numerous pillars of smoke and the air is still filled with the sickening odor of burning human flesh. put above a all making making one forget even the presence of the uncounted uncounted dead is the stench of so much decaying coffee, rice, and other vegetable products that lie swilling with the heat and putrefying. Powerful chemicals and disinfectants are required to prevent what this is sure to produce. Still in the face of all this the soldiers still continued to bury the dead, burning the wreckage, attempting to restore order, and bring about the downfall of the besieged gandalinians.

No word of complaints are to be heard from the non-combatants. The woe which has come upon them is too great for tears and the afflictions of so many persons in the loss of dear ones is entirely forgotten in the heroic fight that is being made for self preservation. A woman of wealth stole through the company streets in the rear of the besieging lines without clothing, save for a bit of torn and gray cloth wrapped about them. Men men of means are in the same sorry plight and go about their gruesome tasks of cleaning up in so stolid a manner that it is obvious that the whole of Angelina has not awakened to the full horror of the situation. There has not been time to think.

It is not uncommon to hear so many worn worn and haggard men either non-combatants and soldiers refer to the loss of comrades or families and their all with so little evidence of concern, that it would attract wonder were not the senses of the war correspondents numbed by the terror of the situation.

It was the re-action that was feared most by those who are leading the effort to drive the rebels out. When a all the work is completed and there is time to think a most heartrending wail of woe will go up from the twenty three or thirty three million men mourning survivors and gloomy desperation is expected to succeed the energy that is not manifested. The spirit of the people who survived the disaster was aptly seen by the action of a non-combatant, who was chief custom inspector of Norma Catherine before it was captured by the enemy. This man was withheld, lost his entire family, father and mother, wife and daughters. The bodies of his father mother, and his daughters were recovered in a mangled condition, but no trace of his wife was ever found. Whether her body was cast into the sea from one of the dreaded funeral barges, or buried or burned could never be known. Terrible as was the blow the man was at his place in the work in Norma Catherine killed in a pair of old pants, all that he managed to save from fire. In his report to Angelina Agathia Colonel Hindle vivian St Olue placed the total loss of life among the christian soldiers as unestimated and ridiculed the idea that any person could estimate the real property loss at any time, and also stated, "That the christians are getting all the losses and horrors, and the still victorious enemy are laughing at them."

He predicted that it would always be impossible to estimate the real loss. He however said the rail, railroad losses was about fifty five million dollars in Norma Catherine alone. At Julio Gallo and Norma Catherine and other sections the main wharfs of the bays and rivers, warehouses and depots and tracks were ruined by the enemy. The thousands of most costly bridges which connected the sections of the city with one another across the rivers were either in ruins or swept away and must be rebuilt to recapture the other parts. The Mc-Holster and Pandora International and Great northern or Abbeville, gundinia and Galvorino had a considerable line of track washed out, while the Gordon railroad, and the Angelina St. gandalines suffered heavily. All tracks between Fortress Thambalin and Gertrude Angelina with all of the bridges was washed away by floods, and many railroad crews were lost. The steady stream of so many refugees from Julio Gallo please wasn't kept up. There was not a departing boat or ship or train which were not packed up to their platforms. Refugees continued to leave for many days hereafter as soon as they could escape from the enemy. No sadder sight could be imagined than the picture presented by big boat loads of refugees when the ropes were cast off and the craft, swung out into the bay or river, and away from the desolated city. There was not a face that certainly was not turned, toward the ruin. There was not an eye that was not motioned by tears. And so great had been the rush to leave behind the scene of the war storm that all boats or transports sent by the besieging fleets had not left a single day without denying passage to a portion of those who were in the most hurry to get away. The partings at the waterside usually were pitiful for those who could not go first. husbands came to gang planks and kissed their weeping wives good bye, turning back to the hard work of reconstruction which confronted them, with broken hearts. Hundreds of poor women, overcome at the last moment, were cared for by strange hands, while those who loved them, bound to remain in Norma Catherine or Julio Gallo by necessity could do no more than watch from afar and pray. Instead of waiting until vivian wickey was reached to begin any kind of work, steps were taken to care for all the coming refugees and hundreds of thousands of them were fed, while great numbers of sick and wounded were well cared for. There were enough provisions on hand ahead to feed the whole christian army and the refugees for months.

But there was also a great deal of trouble in properly distributing supplies the rush at the canteens being as great as at any time since they were opened. And it was indeed a great mercy that the weather even despite the noise of the battle had remained clear and dry for had it rained even one hour the suffering of besiegers and refugees would have been terrible, for there was not a shelter of any reasonable kind in the whole christian line, while the enemy had every comfort possible.

The whole christian army was the centre of relief distribution and also everything else. It was practically the only way in or out for weeks. Hundreds of thousands of refugees passed through every day. All of the christian rear was becoming filled with them but the larger number went right through to points further south east or north guarded by armies. Free transportations were furnished to any point into Angelina provided they had relatives who would take care of them. Many of the liberated refugees arrived at Angelina Agathia and Porphy Gale after four days riding on train scantily clothed and in a pitiful condition. More curiosity was at a strict strict discount at all portions of vivian wickey and the christian lines, and only newspaper men war correspondents and the like, authorized by the military governments and having such passes were permitted here. People even and war correspondents who had urgent business and sent by the governments at Angelina Agathia found it hard to get into Norma Catherine and elsewhere even with permits and passes, and those who were simply curious could not get near the christian lines at all. Even unusual camera fiends were absolutely barred. A man was reported shot by an Abbeville in taking pictures of nude girls boys or women lying dead on the ground, and many newspaper men who were unlawfully taking views of the ruins were rounded up by Abyssinian killians and punchkins, their cameras smashed and themselves forced to go to work gathering up decomposed bodies and the like. Even Angelina Agathia receiving refugees was in a similar state of martial law. Guards surrounded all depots, of all roads running into there or Dorothy Gale and would not even allow curious crowds to gather to see the various parties of refugees come in. This was in enforcement of a proclamation issued by general Hanson, vivian copies of which printed on large red and blue cards were posted conspicuously all over these three cities. The awful war and siege catastrophes all but paralysed all rebel rebel shipping in the river and bay sections.

Scores of thousands of refugees became utterly insane during the week succeeding the battles, horrible bombardments and floods. They had bravely borne the loss of homes, their relatives, the hunger and fatigue, the ferocity of their enemies, had apparently been unmindful of the horrors of the awful catastrophe, and had as a rule given no mortal aberration while the awful disaster was on, but when the first of the horror was passed and relief from the awful strain came, the overburdened mind gave way. General Fernandez, urneranna who was connected with much of experiences; there are at least fifty thousand persons within the rear of our lines especially among the refugees whose minds have become unbalanced, and some have lost every vestige of their mind, there being some raving maniacs among them one of whom came under my personal observation. His name was George Anser, who had been helping in the relief work. He occupied one of the barracks used for refugees and during two days continue continued to rave, and paced the floor like wild and swore and blasphemed and used awful oaths and imprecations, threatened the whole world with destruction and kept calling on god w to witness the truth of what he says and continued to invoke the mercy of the pto Deity. He had lost his family and home, and by a miracle saved himself. As soon as this man was out of personal danger himself on those awful days and nights, he commenced rescuing women and children, and saved many people besides aiding the soldiers according to a soldier who knew the circumstances. He then lost his mind. He finally became so wild and violent and created such excitement and wanted to fight every body and everything he saw that two soldiers were detailed to capture him before he actually killed any one. He apparently heard them approaching, and seizing a gun shot down many who besieged the b-a barracks and then seeing himself pressed too closely shot down a colonel and two more soldiers and then leaped out of a three story window to an adjoining barracks building still firing. His fall however was somewhat broken, but his body struck a bay window of o e one of the rooms. He was however shot and badly injured, but fighting the soldiers madly and like a screaming fiend o worsed them all and continued his mad flight. He baffled all his pursuers and escaped. This was only one scene of the conditions that prevailed in the christian lines. Another man who was a soldier and whose wife and children then in julie callio was killed by a bombshell had been searching in vain for their remains for days and then suddenly located the body in the river not far from his own home. soldiers had also seen thebody of the wife and children both girls, and they took it in charge while the bereaved man looked on apparently laughing over their deaths as if it had beco a great joke. Finally he rushed like a raving demon to take possession of the body yelling in his madness that they were Jandolinian prisoners and belonged to him saying he had seen them first. the soldiers had to discharge their duty even though he was their comrade, and the man terribly demented was bound while the body of his wife and children werethrown into the flames, and soon burned to a crisp. the man yelling and fuming at the mouth made frantic efforts to get away from the soldiers but to no avail. Even many soldiers in the course of their rounds saw many persons families and men and some soldiers who all appeared crazy, and would look into the face of every stranger of or the soldiers with a look and vacant s stare ththat was pitiful and heartrending in the extreme. they were no,doubt hurrying in the direction of the places were provisions were being distributed. they also had lost their homes and had only the clothing on their bac k. here were hundreds of thousands in a similar condition.

"James Jacksonia a young rich man of Armas Catherine who suffered all the while the enemy had been in possession and had seen his wife and children slaughtered during thereign of terror had been insale all that time especially because of those awful scenes he had witnessed and which he had escaped from. When he was in the rear of the lines the soldiers first noticed his condition, when he boldly walked into general Concentinian Aronburgs headquarters and told the general that he was the f father of the gallant yvian irls, that he wanted to see them, and that one of them had deposited $10,000,000 in one of the banks of Angelini a Agathia to his credia credit and that he was going to live in luxury all his life. The man however was reassured by Concentinian Aronburg(the latter who knew something was wrong with the man) that the yvian girls would soon come and seen see him and he was taken to a detention house and placed on the third floor seemingly sane n and laughing laughing and smiling to himself, and then one one occasion telling his guard that he owned the world and yvian ickey, and that he himself was the general in chief of all the christian armies,soon afterwards he became exced exceedingly violent and acted like a man suffering from hydropobia. The guard who watched him was set upon and badly mauled and when he recovered he found the insane man had wrenched the shutters of his window and leaped out upon some awning and thence to the company street. He was seen running toward the river and was pursued by fifty Anglo-Indian soldiers but before they reached him he threw himself into the river and was drowned. Another case was that of a young girl only ten years of age who was caught in the flood made by the enemy and with two other girls and about fifty boys and girls and some men and women found refuge in a building near the river. As the bombardments and storm of flood and firing gradually subsided the little girl started toward her own home quite reassured that her parents and brothers and sisters were safe. When she got there she found a waste of wreckage and a flood of waters still sweeping over the site of her home. Among the first victims she saw carried on a wagon toward the river were the girls mother father and brothers and sisters and all her relatives. These were quickly followed by her mothers brother and wife and her three sisters and their children. The shock overthrew the little girls reason, and not only did she become a nervous wreck, without a relative in the world but so became so fierce that she was like a catamount and as she could not be captured on account of her savagery she was hit shot to death by her pursuers to end her miseries and raving.

to end her miseries and ravaging. It was near the month of September when while the main christian armies were making preparations to push on, and make greater efforts to gain their goal and cause the fall of "Jydan" -^{was} ^{the} city entirely, when a terrible battle opened unexpectedly with the attack of the glandelinians under general Srogoz upon the entire center of Concentinian Aronburgs army. It was a tremendous battle, which involved in all the artillery of both sides being in action, and time and again with dreadful fury the glandelinians in the most massive waves hurled themselves forward against the christian positions. It was not until just as an attempt to retake the main Catherine or Julio Gallo. It was an attempt to force Concentinian Aronburgs main line, and Julio Gallo and its garrisons were left entirely alone. It was a tremendous assault upon Mansions main line with an effort to gall him and compell him to break the siege, or at least by attacking him in this way to compell him to withdraw Jyvananna and the others in the two sections of the city and have them come to the assistance of his centre. General Ursuline's three divisions relieving the brunt of the first violent onslaught had been in position of a strong line of works that during the attack proved a perfect haven of refuge for nearly one million defeated and routed Abyssinkilians under general Jess and panic stricken Angelinians under general Glaz. In the midst of the frightful storm of battle however the hundreds of thousands or more of the Abyssinkilians though sheltered as they were grew wild with their panic and shouted and yelled in true camp meeting fashion untill the nerves of the other defenders who had refugeed them were shattered and a panic of the main three divisions divisions seemed possible. It was then that general Topsy Can appeared with a brigade of Angelinians and a Religious flag with the Sacred Heart Engraved upon it and he sight of this caused a hush in the awful pandemonium. When quiet had been restored, the officers addressed the Abyssinkilians, and told them frankly it was no time for such scenes, that if they wanted to really defend their country flag they must do so from their heart and not act like a lot of frightened chick chickens, and when such a cause as this is so just and holy the Creator of all things would help them through the fearful struggle and amid the roar of the wild battle, which at many other points was then raging with increased fury as they spoke to the awe stricken Abyssinkilians. The Abyssinkilians listened very very attentively and when their generals told them that all those who wished to be cowardly to step out of the line and turn their back to the enemy should do so and they would be held responsible. However the panic which had been precipitated by the falling back of the main army of Abyssinkilians elsewhere had been stemmed by this time, and order and a desperate rally were brought about by the determination of their officers, and their presence of mind, and when the enemy came on again to resume the attack they met a reception they would never forget.

met a reception they would never forget. Friends and comrades that had been separated by this conflict during the retreat were united by the recoiling of the enemy when a rush of reinforcements gained time for them to be rescued and recovered. Heart moving scenes were presented by these reunion reunions as the half dead, an mangled and bruised unfortunates were red rescued from the battle field, and brought to the rear of the lines by the more fortunate members of their comrades.

General Henry Haldemann Prunia was the commander of the Abyssinian brigade that had been driven into such a panic and the experience of him is unfortunate general had been horrible. His brigade was fairly thrown on the mercies of the great Glandelinian attack, we when at the first sweep when the first sweep of the attack came upon his division, and his whole line went down to ruin and was fairly swept away. His staff officers had separated at the time of the shock to see what the nature of the attack was, and when the whole brigade was carried away, he had lost all trace of his many officers, but despite the disaster never lost faith or courage. As he followed his retreating regiments through that inferno a shell struck some obstruction and exploded near him with terrific force and the next instant general Haldemann was hurled down on his face by the concussion and landed in a small ravine which protected him from the onrushing enemy. Hidden down in the ravine, the poor general suffering agonies from three severe wounds was protected to a limited extent from the horrible dominating shell fire, and was also afforded some warmth. While he lay there on went the apparently victorious enemy rushing forward against the Christians like a high sea, and pouring on until it reached the works defended by the three Abissinian brigades and then hurled itself against the works like a tidal wave only to be hurled back with great loss. The general was soon rescued when the Angelinians counter charged and while a few soldiers and a doctor and a red cross nurse, were attending to the general, another chapter in this battle story was being enacted just without the battling lines. In a tree near the roaring battle line, a young man who was a brother of the generals had been directing his own regiment which was battling with the rebel tide, while clinging fast like leeches to their rifle pits, and whose lines swayed back and forth according to the pressure and the released pressure of the assault and the recoiling of the enemy. So thick was the smoke that the young captain hardly knew where his regiment was, and he could merely discern the outlines of some of the works. While not knowing his chance of life or death he was surprised to hear the loud plaintive cry of a child near by despite the awful uproar of the conflict.

Getting down from his tree of observation he saw a little girl running toward the firing line and he darted forward and with one hand he caught the arm of the little tot, who child like cried out; "We go see big fight". The child had run the race aroused to a thrilling situation and a seriousness by the force and roar of the military storm and had not in her excitement time to realize her peril. He quickly took the child toward the rear of the lines. The battle raged with the frightfullest fury until night fall when the enemy failed at all points and were forced to give it up and retreat back to their own lines. In the last assault of the enemy they had almost gained a victory. The rebels had come on with such violence as to capture the entire works along a portion of the lines and the Angelinians were driven to the rear and forced to fight in the location of the refugees in their efforts to repel the assault. Many were the experiences of the very non-combatants. A woman and her three daughters each seven, eight, and nine years of age had narrow escapes from the rebels when the assault was made upon the camps.

"We were indeed extremely fortunate." Said the woman whose name will not be given as she leaned wearily back in a rocking chair and tenderly contemplated the three children at her side. She had arrived from the Christian lines at Angelinia Agathia destitute save for a few personal effects carried in a small hand bag and her nerves shattered by a week of horror. "It seems to me like an awful dream, and when I think of the hundreds of thousands of soldiers fighting desperately for us who were killed in that terrible battle right before our eyes I feel as though I always ought to be satisfied no matter what comes. The reports of the results of the battle that come from there are not half as appalling as the situation really was and is still. We left the Christian lines on a train on the afternoon after the day of that frightful battle and reached here by rail. The condition of the besieging armies, and the strength of the besieged at that time while even showing improvement despite their loss of Norma Catherine and Julio Callio was awful, and during that dreadful battle when the enemy carried the works, never shall I forget the terrible scenes that met our eyes and the eyes of hundreds of other women and hundreds of little children besides mine as the enemy drove the soldiers to our own quarters and made a storming attack, opening fire with musketry and cannon. In a few minutes from the effects of the enemy's fire there were many bodies of soldiers lying on all sides of us and we all fled to the strong barracks for protection. The storming attack raged for an hour and I feared the Angelinians fighting so bravely in our own camps would be swept away, but Constantinian Aronburg must have known of the confusion for suddenly firing was heard of tremendous volume to the rear of us and steadily but surely the enemy began to run and finally a perfect wave of Christians came in sight and stormed the enemy back to where they came from and we were finally saved. I assisted for several hours in the work of rescue of the wounded with many of the other women and men. In one pile of debris of a smashed down barracks we found an officer who seemed to have escaped the shelling but nevertheless was injured and pinned down so he could not escape. A guard came along and after many men failed to rescue her he deliberately shot him to end his misery. The company streets in the rear of the Christian lines at which our refugees were quartered for protection was now a gruesome appearance after that near sweep of battle. Every available wagon behind which which batches of Angelinian soldiers had taken defense and every vehicle and cannon in that city of encampments was now being used to transport the many dead soldiers, and it was no uncommon thing to see in every wagon a load of bodies twenty deep. Though so early the stench in the company streets was nauseating. Since the tremendous attack of the enemy the only water we could find in use for drinking purpose within the rear of the lines was the army cisterns and now they have become tainted with the slime and filth that covers the city of camps until it is little better than no water at all. Since the attack had subsided like the ending of some great storm conditions soon had become much better and there is little lawlessness. The soldiers who have survived the battle have shown no quarter and have orders to shoot on sight. Everybody who remains in the rear of the lines has to work and the punishment for a refusal is about the same as that meted out to vandals and ghouls. I saw four spies shot in one day before the battle broke out. When they had been captured they were found with in their possession a flour sack all almost filled with important letters and plans and maps and other articles and books belonging to many Angelinian officers. In the work of rescue, we found whole families tied together with ropes, and in several instances mothers had their babes clasped in their arms as if expecting a repeat of the battle. Scores of thousands of unfortunate refugees are straggling into Porothy Gale and Angelinia Agathia from the various wickets under strong protecting escorts every day and their condition is pitiable. Many have lost their reason. The citizens of Angelinia Agathia and Porothy Gale and the armies there are doing all in their power to meet the demands of the sufferers, and every available building in the mobilization camp, in the two cities and elsewhere, and also in St. Betsy Gobbin and Trot has been converted into a host hospital. When we arrived in Angelinia Agathia we scarcely had cloths enough to cover us, and the citizens fitted us out and started us for St. Betsy Gobbin. The fear of fever, or some awful plague, or of the enemy recapturing all they lost and creating some awful scene drove us from the region. Already many spectators are flocking to Angelinia Agathia but they are being turned away."

VIVIAN WICKEY FACES SERIOUS DANGER FROM FIRE.---THE ENEMY XSEE TO IT THAT THERE IS A SCARCITY OF BOATS AND SHIPS TO CARRY OTHER PEOPLE OF VIVIAN WICKEY TO THE CHRISTIAN LINES.---MORE TROOPS PUT INTO NORMA CATHERINE AND ALSO LABORERS.---UNTOLD SUFFERINGS AT MIC-WHITHER.

EXPERIENCE OF A MAN WHOSE HOME IS IN ANGELINIA AGATHIA. TWO PERSONS TELL HOW THEY WERE AFFECTED AT VIVIAN WICKEY.---ONE ARRIVED AFTER THE GREAT DISASTER, WHILE THE OTHER FACED THE STORMING BATTLE FROM BEGINNING TO END.

One of the most serious dangers that any section of Vivian Wickey faced after the great battles previously mentioned was fire. Not a drop of rain had fallen during the over two weeks succeeding the capture of Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo, and the hot winds and blistering sun, and the continual shelling made the wrecked houses which were so much like tinder a danger to the whole city the wreckage being piled mountain high in every direction possible. In nearly all parts of the ruined sections of Vivian Wickey the many fire hydrants were buried.

Fifty to sixty feet in some places a hundred feet or more deep under the terrible wreckage, and as yet the water supply at best was only of the most meager kind. Though Vivian Wickey's fire department was enormously big there being thousands of fire companies they were badly crippled, or in the possession of the enemy, and even then would have been utterly powerless to stay the flames should they once begin to start. There was no relief nearer than Angelinia Agathia and that was many days away and the nearest town to Vivian Wickey was also in possession of the glandelinians.

In view of all the then existing conditions it was no wonder that the cry among the many Christian generals was "Get the women and children to our lines--anywhere out of the city--now nor was it a wonder that with so many boats in the hands of the enemy that only a few boats at a time could be used by the Angelinians to carry people to the lines from the city and making only two trips a day people fairly fought desperately to be taken aboard. The sanitary conditions did not improve to any great extent. General Trueheart, chairman of one of the committees in charge of caring for the sick and wounded soldiers, was proceeding with dispatch. Many more doctors were needed, and he requested that about three thousand outside physicians come to the main Christian armies besieging Vivian Wickey and work for at least two months, and if needed much longer. The electric light service of Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo was completely destroyed and the city electrician said that only when the whole city was in the hands of the Angelinians again before any portion of the city could be relighted.

The unfortunate inhabitants of Vivian Wickey and the big Christian armies received another big scare on the first of September when it became rumored that beautiful Angelinia Agathia, and even Dorothy Gale, where thousands of newly furnished relief train trains had been prepared were burning with all their precious supplies of food and clothing. The scare grew out of a four hundred million dollar fire in the town of Betsy Dobson which destroyed a big munition plant the largest in the world, which had been set on fire by secret glandelinian spies or vandals. The fire broke out early in the morning followed by many big explosions, but it was not observable at night from Dorothy Gale or Angelinia Agathia until nightfall, when the bright glow in the sky could be seen for a hundred miles. The besieging armies at Vivian Wickey was fully reassured by telegraph that a second big calamity was out of the question, and that the relief supplies were safe. One feature of the efforts to relieve the refugees and the besieging armies was the delay on account of the many battles of getting supplies to them in besieging armies.

Trainloads after trainloads many miles long were frequently leaving Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale and the neighboring cities, which would have assisted materially in the work of relief but account of the limited transportation facilities and on account of the rumors of so many rebel armies advancing from either east, north west or south they could not be hurried there and had to be fully guarded by armored trains. There was only the Mic-Holleston line that was open for railroading the many others being broken up or derailed. Even if the supplies were at a closer place they on account of the war conditions could not be moved fast. Grinnell town could be used safely and easily from Angelinia Agathia by way of the Norma gun river but it was just then almost impossible to spare the boats for that purpose.

General C. Conantian Aronburg fearing that the enemy may finally make a general effort to recapture Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo decided to put in more larger armies and also so to import a large number of laborers. This action was taken with the consent of the many non-combatants and many local unions of Angelinia. Thousands of skilled mechanics had been busy burying the many dead and helping the soldiers without pay but were relieved of this work and replaced by imported skilled labor.

Nervous prostration, hysteria, and mild or severe dementia occurred among many of the bravest of the soldiers, and refugee refugees, due to shell shock, exhaustion and grief and many being forced to use even spoiled food had led to intestinal troubles. Even many cases of prostration from the heat had occurred among the soldiers and many workers in the city.

"We are indeed very thankful," said General Daniel Jones when told of the arrival of the relief trains from Angelinia Agathia. "No one can many any good statement about Angelinia Agathia. We are thankful and thankful again. The people of Angelinia Agathia are among the best and staunchest friends in the world in times like these. Yes as soon as we have recaptured the whole of Vivian Wickey and all her surrounding fortifications we will build up her again like and like Angelinia Agathia, we will make it even a better city than it was. We shall never forget the kindnesses of the people of Angelinia Agathia in coming so generously to the relief of the refugees and we thank them all and the world in general from the bottom of our hearts." After suffering untold privations for over a week on Angelinia Agathia a few miles from the east end of Thambolinia port, General Lawrence Peter David had the most thrilling and yet trying time of his life. This general with what remained of his staff and division of troops reached the main Christian lines, almost famished, and nearly naked, but overcome with amazement and joy at their miraculous delivery from what seemed to him certain death.

The assaulting glandelinian columns fairly wrecked his division, annihilated their neighboring brigades, and to cut off their retreat and cause their surrender cut off and destroyed every particle of food for miles around, yet the division with their brave general and his officers passed through the terrible days and nights raising their voices above the shriek shriek of the shells in words of encouragement as they fought and repelled every assault of the enemy until they were compelled to retreat before overwhelming numbers, and through it all though the division lost heavily in killed and wounded the general and his whole staff went through all experience unscathed without receiving a single scratch. When the full force of the enemy at attack struck against General David's army at Peterson Run the onslaught was so fierce and the enemy advanced so fast that before it was realized the soldiers were pouring over the works with fixed bayonets before any of the generals or their chief commanders knew or realized the danger. Running up to one of the batteries not in action the officers ordered them to start for the first firing line which they did, but before they were able to fire one volley the glandelinians had rushed up only to be wiped out by the fire of the Christian infantry line. With the greatest difficulty the artillery was saved from destruction by the fearful fire of the enemy's main line, and when safe, the battery half exposed and half floating in water, were half drawn half swamped, or sinking in the mire and drawn with great speed to a grove where again they spit death and destruction to the enemy. With a long close line the Angelinians had managed to make a sort of trap for the advancing enemy and while this was being done the infantry lines withdrew and took defense.

behind a long lodge of rocks. One of the Brigades under General Shorn secured a position behind a long chain of broken wagons and the like, while the third division got a position above. While the fierce hurricane of rebel attack raged in front, and a mad onslaught of rebels dashed madly before them, the Angelinians now clung desperately and bravely to their new position. The artillery tore a column of rebels down every time it was discharged while the infantry despite all the assaults met held fast to their precarious haven of works.

For two hours general Anister held the girl haired glandelinians at bay with his troops and other points the works were also found to be a precarious footing but the enemy was resisted successfully. When night came and the enemy attack had redoubled, wreckage, dead animals, and the corpses and wounded soldiers of the rebels surrounded the works like a perfect field of death. The enemy who had almost surrounded the Angelinians had faced almost annihilation in the attack.

And the survivors gave way and left the little division to retreat to its own main shelter without further molestation. Where however was nothing to eat for the survivors of the Angelinians and nearly dead with exhaustion, the general and his remnants set out for the main lines. Most of the men were too weak to continue far and sank down on the plain, while the remainder pushed on alone. Half a mile away hastily abandoned houses were found, partially intact, and securing a team of wagons general Davis returned for his half dead 10,000 survivors out of a hundred thousand men. For two days the small handful of survivors remained at this section of ruined homes and then set out anew to make their way to the Christian lines.

In the heat of the burning sun and under shot and shell they plodded on along the river front, subsisting upon animals which they killed and devoured raw, until finally they came upon an abandoned but a strong line of boats by the river. With a united effort they succeeded in getting down stream in the boats and with improvised distress signals displayed managed to sail to Norma Catherine. Where because of the frowning guns of fortress Gertrude Angelina they were unable to approach within half a mile and so the whole little brave band clad in old ragged uniforms, with their generals in even worse plights, the troops continued onward until they reached the main Christian line where they were refueled.

In this battle with overwhelming forces of the enemy and the division it was reported that on the fields upward of 16,544 bodies of Christian soldiers had been found and buried and many were still lying on the ground. Assistance was needed. It was a fact generally commented upon and more emphasized by the battle with this little division and overwhelming numbers of the enemy, that while succor was being rushed to millions of refugees, and while Norma Catherine and Julio Gallio were in the hands of the besiegers that many battles continued to rage at unexpected places and that many other sufferers were seemingly neglected. Where relief trains en route from Angelina Agathia to the besieging armies traversed a war and battle wept region where famishing and nearly naked survivors sat on the wreckage of their works and fortifications, and hungrily watched tons of provisions whirling past them while there was little little prospects of aid reaching them. One of the most difficult and peculiar operations in the Christian armies known to medical history in this war and a complete rarity was performed by six Angelinian surgeons the morning after the enemy's main assaults on Concentinian Aronburg's main centre, at an army hospital near the wrecked town of Jennie Vivian. Colonel Wigshell was blown from his horse during the engagement by the explosion of a high powdered high explosive shell, and while he was blown to fragments and disembowled the officer was thrown head first for three hundred feet with a force that his cervical vertebra was dislocated, and two legs broken, and one armed crush arm crushed and one eye injured and all his teeth knocked out of his mouth. His head fell forward on his chest and he had to power to raise it. It was a plain case of mortally wounded as many doctors said especially a broken neck, but the physicians operated successfully. They placed the colonel's neck in a plaster cast and though the officer may live for all his life despite his great injuries he would not be able to serve in the army again. Lieutenant Menage of Angelina Agathia who returned with his wounds from the besieging armies the night succeeding the battle along Aronburg's center, had reached the central line of the Christian army on an important message the morning before the terrible battle storm began. He declared to his friends that it had been the most terrible week in his experience, the most awful day a man could imagine.

The morning before the terrific conflict when the lieutenant reached the lines on a message to General Concentinian Aronburg the artillery of both sides was hammering unusually hard, and one of the generals he met said "We are in for a big battle" and the lieutenant asked him in his divisions were strong enough to resist an assault and if the positions were firmly fixed, and the general said "Well the assault I'm sure won't be quite as bad as that" but by the next hour at the same time there was three big lines of the enemy advancing extending for six miles, the artillery had redoubled the uproar, great explosions were occurring, and one line of glandelinians had already been blown to pieces, and the rear of the lines was crowded with refugees who arrived or had arrived from all points of the city by land or in boats and the like. Near the works there was three feet of water through some unknown cause.

And it was reported that at one point of the line of Christians a division of Abyssinians had fallen back in panic and were making confusion among the others who refueled them. The lieutenant watched the scene but as the assaulting wave did not swerve toward the line at his own view the lieutenant did not yet realize the extent of the assault. The shock soon came however and all was perfect turmoil for all day. On the following morning one could walk even in the rear of the Christian lines and here the place was one great litter of dead glandelinians, of wrecked homes, debris of all kinds and many dead horses. The lieutenant met one woman refugee who burst into tears at the sight of a small rocker.

Her property mixed in among the battle smitten wreckage. He had lost all her friends in the battle and her own husband. People among the refugees and even children they had witnessed among their very refuge, and a single funeral would have seemed more terrible--more solemn--than a pile of cremated bodies. The tale of still continued lotting of officers headquarters and the like by rebel spies and daring valdas vandals were only too true, and once the lieutenant shot one himself. And yet the glandelinians in Vivian Wickley all declare "that Vivian Wickley hall rise again and hold out to the last under all conditions" with and without as much difficulty as is at present anticipated.

Three fourths of the refugees who applied for relief within the Christian lines were mentally dull. The physicians said however that with proper care most of them might be cured. A young child of ten years of age was brought into the general relief station at the rear of the lines on the night after the battle on Aronburg's center. The Angelinians under Corporals out scouting to see the enemy's movements found her huddled like a frightened kitten in an empty battered parson's garb, not laughing and singing to her self and making faces at everything. The doctor who took her under care however said food and care and loving treatment were all she needed to restore her to reason. It was also another day after the battle and flood before those from the very outside began to find out what the awful calamity was to the people of the desolated city. It was the Angelinians who were suffering on account of the scene and not the enemy and this fact made General Concentinian Aronburg so angry that he bit his hand like a mad dog and once he said with perfect calmness to his generals "The enemy from me will receive no quarter here."

However now for a while the first of the shocks was wearing off off the long list of dead and missing were getting to be an old story, and the sick and wounded and suffering were crawling into places of refuge. Many of them had been sleeping on the open prairies over six since the disasters most of them in fact, men with broken arms and legs, sick women and ailing children. They had crawled out of their shell wrecked homes and lay down on the bare ground to die. Many of the scouting parties, and relief parties found such as these every hour, and brought them into the military hospitals in the rear of the Christian lines as far as possible. One scouting party alone found five thousand people in the vicinity of the very Christian rear, homeless, hopeless, hopeless, and tearless. It was indeed a sight to cause a stone image to weep. On the night after the battle on Aronburg's center a soldier rode up to an Angelinian internment hospital camp, and told the army doctors he had just come from the battle line. "Said he 'Many of the refugees are starving. There is nothing left, and the children are crying for milk'."

There are so many sick people among the refugees on account of the enemy that many of the generals don't know what to do. Can you send some one down?" The doctor in charge said he would go immediately. The soldier on horseback leaned over his saddle and tried to speak but something in his face frightened the doctor. He called two soldiers. They ran out and caught him. He was poor man in a dead faint. When he had been brought to his senses he laughed sheepishly.

"I don't know what is the matter with me," he said. "I have never been taken this way before."

The good doctors looked at each other and then smiled, but the red cross nurses eyes were full of tears. The soldier had not tasted food for nearly two days, and had ridden fifty miles in the broiling sun and was wounded in the army by a musket shot. More and more troops that could be spared were continually sent into Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo so that soon it was impossible for the enemy to retake, and to assault would mean suicide. Concentinian Aronburg was warring in on the city tighter and crowding the enemy further and further.

A newspaper correspondent, and the first of that kind of sex from the outside to gain admittance to the sealed city of Vivian Wickey--wrote to his friends a description of what he had the chance to see and hear there. He happened to arrive in the Christian lines and at Norma Catherine a week or more after the disaster and although he happened to be on an relief train, carrying army doctors, Red Cross nurses, and immense medical supplies he had hard work, yes indeed very hard work, to get past the file of sentries and other guards in entering the Christian lines, but he at last succeeded. Said he;

"The engineer engineer who had the chance to bring our train down from fair Angelina Agathia spent the week before groping around the terrible wrecks of both both sections of Vivian Wickey looking for his wife, children and relatives. He found them, and dug a grave in the ground in the rear of the besieging Christian armies and then set a little board marked with his name. There was a sad solemn eyed man sitting in front of me on the railway car who had went through the whole week of horror at Vivian Wickey. He told me that he had kissed his wife and children good bye when the enemy were striving to repel the assaults on Norma Catherine and told her that the Angelinians could not hold out much longer but they did hold on, Norma Catherine was rescued and was taken by the Angelinians, and when finally hostilities ceased for a short while a new day broke and showed him that the Christian armies were successful. He and his wife and children escaped with their lives. However every man or woman on that train had lost some one that they loved in the terrible war disaster, and were going into the Christian lines to try and find some trace of their friends or families who had been held prisoners so long in Vivian Wickey. As the train neared Pandora City, sixty miles nearer Vivian Wickey a gray flame seemed to be leaping up somewhere and he man said to one of the men sitting along side of him;

"What a most terrible fire that is indeed. Some of the largest buildings in Pandora must be burning."

man however who was passing back and forth in the middle of the pullman coach had reached behind the correspondents chair or coach and heard his remark. He stopped put his hand on the handle of the chair and turned down and looked into the correspondents face and looked into his face, his face like the face of a dead man indeed; but he laughed.

"Are they buildings on fire you say?" He said. "Don't you know what is really burning over there. Why I'll tell you. They are my wife and children--such innocent little children. Why the tallest was not any higher than the top of the chair you are sitting on"--he laid his hand on the top. "And the littlest one was just learning to talk--she called me papa the other day, and now they are all burning over there--they and the good loving mother who bore them. My wife was such a tender delicate thing, and now she is out there all alone, with the two baby girls and one boy, and they are being burned up."

He man laughed again and began again to walk up and down the car.

"That's right. Said A Marshall dressed in full uniform taking off his broad soldier hat and letting the sunlight from a window shine on his strong brave face.

"That's right indeed. We Angelinian soldiers had to do it, are compelled to do it as there are too many dead. We have burned over one million people in a week, and to morrow it is likely we shall burn many more. Yesterday we were compelled to stop burying the many bodies at sea or in the river, we had to give the men a drink and even soldiers on the big barges whiskey and brandy to give them courage to do the work. They carried out hundreds of thousands of the dead in half a day, soldiers who fell in battle, men women and children of the killed refugees all piled up as high as the barges could stand the load, and the men did not dare go out far enough to sea for fear of getting in range of the Uclio River, and the bodies have all begun drifting back again."

"Look there" said the man who was walking up and down the chair car touching the shoulder of the news paper reporter with his shaking hand. "Look there."

Before he had any time to even think he had to look and saw as the train was running along side the river floating in the water many bodies of soldiers, and at intervals he saw groups of strange drift wood. He looked closer and found it to be a mass of wooden planks, wheels and other materials proving they were wrecked army wagons. The train finally pulled up when near the first section of the big besieging army positions in the hush of approaching evening, there were no lights anywhere in the distant city of Vivian Wickey and the only lights seen were the searchlights in the enemy's lines. He finally picked himself up one of the company streets. The ground was slimy with the debris of the river. Near the city and reaching its outskirts the correspondent climbed over wreckage and picked his way through heaps of rubbish. The terrible odor was sickening and almost overcame him, and it was all he could do to shut his teeth, and get through the city street somehow. A long or big swarm of soldiers were camped on one of the big river wharf fronts some lying stretched out on the wet river sand, the hideous hideous sand, stained and streaked in the sink: sinking runways with dark and cruel bloody blotches. They challenged him but the Marshall took him through under his protection. At every street corner of the city of Norma Catherine was a guard and every guard wore a six shooter strapped around his waist. The city was full of soldiers fierce looking purple coated soldiers. He went toward the heart of Norma Catherine. He did not know at all what the names of the streets were or where he was really going. He simply managed to pick his way through masses of slime and run rubbish which scar the beautiful wide streets of the once most beautiful city in Galvernia. They would not bear looking at all those piles of rubbish. There also were things that would grip the hardest heart to see--a baby's shoe, for instance, some little red shoe, with a jaunty tasseled lace,--or a bit of woman's dress and letters, or a dead body of a woman or child. He shrank from these piles of rubbish was almost overpowering to him. Down in the very heart of the city of Norma Catherine most of the dead bodies of many soldiers falling in the battle in the city had been recovered but it did not do to walk too far out as he could expose himself to the mercy of the enemy batteries beyond the captured city, especially from Thumelina and Gertrude Angeline. The correspondent came upon a group of people in the street being soldiers. When later he came upon a group of strange looking men who were digging in a heap of rubbish and when they heard his foot steps one of the men turned an evil glowing face upon him, and another of the men hid something in his pockets. Angelinian ghouls, these prowling in search of prey. Moment later there was great noise and excitement in the little narrow street, and the correspondent looked back and saw the three Angelinians running and firing, with a crowd of Angelinian soldiers at his heels. The crowd of soldiers caught them however and would have killed him on the spot but an officer came up. They tied his hands and took him through the streets with a whoop whooping rabble at their heels. It goes hard with spies in the besieging Christian lines at Vivian Wickey caught even looting the dead in those days. A young Christian soldier well known in the city of Norma Catherine shot and killed a landelinian in disguise who was discovered attempting to cut open a little girls body while she was alive. The dead landelinian lay in the street like a dead dog and no one would give him the tribute of a kindly look. The awful abomination of desolation reigned on every side. Thousands of the bigest houses were dismantled by the shell fire, their roofs gone, windows broken, and the high water mark of floods caused by the bursted river levees showed inconceivably high on the paint.

All the littlest houses along the river fronts are all gone, p----- either completely gone as if they were made of cards, and a giant hand which was tired of playing with them had swept them all off the board and put them away, or they were lying in heaps of kindling wood covering indeed no one knows what awful horrors beneath. The main streets of the beautiful city was indeed pitiful in Norma Catherine. Here and there a shop of some peculiar kind was left standing. South north Anna street looked like an old mans toothless jaw, with one or two straggling teeth protruding. The water of the river flood produced by the enemy in their efforts to stop the assault of the Christians must have rushed through the streets and the stores and lower sections of the houses in an irresistible avalanche that carried all before it. The wonder is not that so little of Norma Catherine or Julio Gallo was still left standing but that there was any of it at all. The very street story has its awful story, in its history of awful misery and human agony bravely endured through a hell of shell fire and battles frightful fury. The eye witnesses of a hundred thousand deaths have talked with many war correspondents and told their awful heart rending story and not one of them has ever told of a cowardly death. Even all the soldiers, met their deaths bravely and the red cross nurses met their fate while on duty at their work of mercy as did the soldiers, bravely and for the most part with the most astonishing calmness. One woman told the newspaper correspondent that she and her husband and her children when the enemy shelled the city went into the main kitchen and hid themselves under the large kitchen table to escape the horrible fragments of the shells, and that they knelt under here and prayed continually. As they prayed an explosion blew the whole house to fragments and a fire following swept the wreckage of the house away and her husband and children with it, and the day after she went out to the place where her house had been but there was nothing there but a mass of burned wreckage and embers. Her husbands body was twisted in the branches of a tree into which he had been hurled by the explosion, six blocks from the house. She recognized him by a locket he happened to have around his neck. The locket she gave him before they were married. The poor woman told the correspondent all this without a tear or a trace of emotion even though she had never found her dead children. No one cries in Vivian Wickey. The refugees as even in the rear of the Christian lines will stand for hours and tell soldiers and visitors the most heinous stories that would turn the blood in the veins of a man or woman or the hardened soldier cold with horror, without the quiver of an eyelid.

An officer who was a colonel in the Angelinian army and who operated a military telegraph office told the news paper correspondent how he had lost two hundred men out of his company of one thousand three hundred men, two of his best horses which had been killed under him, and two lieutenants who had been his life long friends. He then went into minute particulars, told how his most expensive house in Julio Gallo had been built, that it cost a hundred thousand dollars, and how it was strengthened and made firm against the worse of typhoons. He told how the enemy came early in the war took Vivian Wickey in possession created her horrors and though sparing him swept all his property away, and how at the bombardment just past during the fierce fighting in the streets he had climbed over a mass of roofs with his regiment and fought the enemy from house to house, and how after that awful death struggle he had found his two lieutenants death and lying in the very gutter. He also told how much his horses had cost when he entered the army and why he had been so fond of them, and how hard he had tried to save his regiment from such awful loss but the news paper correspondent said:

"You have survived the battle yourself, and even probably your family is living safe away from Vivian Wickey and may never have seen it so you ought not to be implaining." The officer stared at him with blank unseeing eyes.

"Why I did not and could not save my family." He said. "They were all killed in the reign of terror at Norma. I thought you surely knew that, I don't care to talk much about it."

The heinous horror of the whole thing had benumbed everyone who saw it.

General Pixley a Unionist who served in the Angelinian army had a trying life in the Christian lines during the time of the big assault against the whole Centre of Concentinian Aronburg lines. The general who was wounded arrived at Angelinia Agathia on Sunday in August, from Vivian Wickey, where he had with his whole brigade a most trying time during the enemys attempts to carry general Christian's works by storm. He happened to see Violet and her sisters and their friend Gertrude Angeline when he was visited by Violet and he told them the story of his experiences in a wonderfully graphic way.

"I had only been in general Concentinian Aronburgs centre for about six weeks, visiting the general on some important military matter. It was not until after the noon of the last day of August or the middle of August I mean that the refugees were badly frightened because of so many loud horrid signals heard from the enemys lines, sounding like whistles, or booming shots in the fashion of the five strokes of drums, or like siren whistles, and roaring sounds. Concentinian Aronburg and others were suspicious and therefore from their being careful had not seen their centre crushed when the assault came. When the last rebel assault had been made with such violence as to carry a portion of the works, the captured artillery had been turned upon the Angelinians who retreated into the barracks beyond and before the shot shell and explosives these buildings with the fiercely battling soldiers in them went down as mere egg-shells before that death dealing artillery storm.

About 1:30 o'clock when the battle was raging along the whole Christian line with inconceivable fury, I rode up to general Schooler and told him that some one must make their way to general Concentinian Aronburg and warn him of the nature of the assault, while I would have to for safety sake withdraw my brigade to my stronger works for the enemy was driving forward like a tornado and nothing could stop the insurgents here. The battle had gone on to a fury beyond anything human within two hours, and as I hurried off on my horse toward a portion of my line the wind of a passing shell tore off my hat, and I was blinded by the thick smoke of firing for a while.

When the uproar grew louder I turned my eyes to the southwest where the worse of the battle was then raging and for sixteen long miles I was surprised to see that there was not a line of troops standing their ground, everything had been swept away. That must have been the time when the enemy carried the works and drove the Angelinians to the rear and attacked even the camps. How we ever resisted the insane efforts of the enemy on our own front I do not know. So fierce was the firing that it appeared as if the screeching demons attacking us fairly waded in the smoke as if it was a mirage and every few minutes many of my men were fairly carried off their feet by the concussion of so many cannons thundering, and as the enemy dashed against our works like a tidal wave out fire cut them down in tens of thousands. The point of our line the enemy was striving desperately to reach was on the left. I realized the concentration of so many torn and tattered battle flags in that quarters what was up hurried a portion of my reserves in that location, and we stayed the enemy assault for several hours. At last it seemed as if the rebels had found an opening and a portion of the gray line looking like little girls with their hair in all shapes broke through and swarmed over a portion of the works fighting like mad to press on, and we generals had a mad time to keep the enemy from doing it by hurling masses against them and cutting them down by a fire of grape and canister. The enemy coming on elsewhere reached my section of the line, and I expected every moment to be carried to my death but nevertheless kept directing my men. How it happened I can never tell but we held the works like leeches. As it was many thousands of my men had been killed in the works we so bravely defended. After all the excitement and the roar of battle was over, I felt faint from hunger, and while too weak from excitement to receive food, I told my general in chief I would go to my provisions tent and get something to eat. I felt queasier and somehow and staggered along the ground until I reached a rocky ledge, and fell half fainting near it. As I leaned there I witnessed sights reared from the desperate struggle that I pray God will never make you little girls see. Lying on all sides for miles and miles bodies of fallen soldiers more than I could dare to count lay either crushed or mangled between cannons, or in the open plain or in perfect wedges across the works and between a jumble of timbers and debris from a shattered fortified line of works.

I also saw when I lay wounded in my tent men, women and children all refugees go by moving on toward some portion of the christian rear I know not where. I felt horrified at their sad wild looking faces and wanted to close my eyes, but I could not. I cried aloud and made an attempt to get up and go to my friends, but I was exhausted and all I could do was to remain and watch the terrible scenes.

Babies, oh such pretty little ones, girls and boys too were carried on in that torrent of panic humanity, gowned in dainty or ragged clothing, their eyes open staring in mute terror. Thank Providence they were out of Vivian, Mickey and away from the enemy at last. I was a partly blinded by tears of sorrow and emotion but I could still see through the mists. Little arms seemed to stretch toward me asking assistance and there I lay, half prostrated too weak to lend assistance. How it all ended I cannot tell, I know not. I must have fainted for I awakened with;

"We are saved general," the enemy are retreating," ringing in my ears."

It was some days before I could get away to Angelina Agathia for a rest and to recover from my wounds, and though I was opposed I declared I would go at all costs.

I thought of home and my parents, and I wanted to telegraph to Angelina Agathia just like the thousands of others, that I was safe and had lived through the wildest and bloodiest battle I have ever seen. The day we left the militia in Norma Catherine was out in all its force. I could hear the steady sharp reports of distant cannon and the thunder of exploding shells occasionally and the wail of some soldier as a shell dropped him somewhere. Later I saw some soldiers with their glistening rifles leveled at men, and saw them topple over dead. Oh they had to shoot those terrible beasts they were robbing the generals, robbing the dead, outraging little ones. They groveled in blood those vandals, it seemed. I saw with my own eyes the bodies of little children lying in wreckage cut open by the regular demons in search for some jewels and the like. The soldiers came and killed them and it was well.

As we made outway to the boats that was to take me and my followers from the city and battlefields of death, I saw great clouds of smoke rising in the air in many intervals. Upon the flaming tops of boards and wreccages thousands upon thousands of dead soldiers were being reduced to ashes. It was best, for the odor that arose from so many dead bodies was simply dreadful. Still it made ones heart ache with a sorrow never to be equalled as one would be occasionally beforced to witness little children tossed into the midst of the hissing flames. Do you little princesses wonder that I a big man as I ought to be and a brave soldier cried before me no matter which way I turned, I could see dead bodies of many soldiers with their cold eyes gazing at me with startling intentness. I closed my eyes and I stumbled forward hoping I might be able to escape for a moment the sight of so many dead bodies but no, the moment I would open them again, right at my very feet, I would find the form of some poor soldier. Coming to Angelina Agathia on the

away wrong indeed. It will be more than ten million on our own side alone. I know for certainty that I am right, every one in the christian armies besieging Vivian, Mickey there talks of twelve million dead, fifteen million dead and over eighteen million dead but it will be ten million at the very least. I believed the worse sight I ever was forced to witness was the two million eight hundred thousand bodies carried out to the sea and rivers and buried in the waters. Huge one hundred foot armed barges were tied at the many wharves and loaded with the piles of unknown dead soldiers and even non-combatants. As fast as one barge was filled it made its way from the shore, and weighting the dead bodies the soldiers and men workers cast them into the water.

"Oh those eyes. That I might put them from my mind. I can see even now those little children, mere babies go floating by my place of refuge, dead, dead. God alone knows the suffering I and probably all of the others went through. Hundreds of thousands yes hundreds of thousands of poor souls were carried over the brink of death in the twinkling of an eye, and I saw it all."

Another man who saw Violet and her sisters after returning to Dorothy Gale said;

"I left Vivian Mickey night before the main battle on concentinian Aronburgscentre and things then in the neighborhood was in a dreadful state. Norma Catherine is about twelve miles distant of the main christian fortified siege works and even when I arrived here refugees were pouring in the direction of Angelina Agathia in greatest numbers. Many well to do people have lost all they had. During the battle general William Henry Gainer and his entire staff of generals and officers were killed and their troops almost destroyed, and it was reported to me that Colonel Canney was also killed as well as a number of lieutenants. Even at Dorothy Gale and O Sam Oama town relief committees have been organized."

The general whose name was Cain had been well known in Angelina Agathia. General Cyrus at Angelina Agathia in command of some of the big mobilization camps at Oama received a letter from Concentinian Aronburg saying that over five million glandelinians must have lost their lives during the battle storms, and that fully eighty million are wounded or prisoners. Scooped up in a ravine after his regiment had met annihilation during the battle general John Johnson brother of general Abner Double Day Federal Johnston who had formerly lived at South Agathia Street Angelina Agathia and his wife and two children met death in the battle and flood during the attempts to get out of the heavily shelled city. All were in a bul building at the time and no one had escaped. The authorities at Angelina Agathia were dumfounded when they received the first information of the awful disaster, for they had no idea of it. General General Milton of the Abbasannians had his own experience with the enemy during the conflict.

His troops which had been in open ground moved to better cover when the enemy began to advance. All at once the attack came bringing with it all the horrors of battle. The Angelinians started to retreat, but before it they could get to their works their whole column went to pieces before the enemys deadly fire. General Milton was struck with a bullet and soon seriously wounded and knocked to the ground. He managed to rise to his feet however and following his retreating troops as best as he could managed to make his escape. He saw few of his brigade escape the enemy. He did not believe that one quarter of it was left. He had wired later for definite news regarding his own losses but have heard nothing more.

About a week or well later it was reported that a most terrific attack was concentrated upon a portion of the left wing of general Vivianannas main line near Julio Calloio Gallo. The attack started on the following morning and was raging with the most greatest severity toward the afternoon. Heavy glandelinian columns moved against the christian lines like furious heavy cyclone rollers, and the strongest of the assault was made against general Wisnatiens positions. All of the assaulting glandelinian columns that got within dull range of the christian fire were mowed down, but the assault of the main glandelinian column continued furiously and almost irresistibly. During the later afternoon however some of the rebel columns not accomplishing their end began falling back, though a furious artillery duel was starting. By evening the cannonade had reached a terrible volume and even within the rear of the Christian lines bells were falling and exploding. The violence of the enemy assault and the artillery duel continued to increase during the whole remainder of the afternoon, and at four o'clock an assaulting column moved against the Christian line which extended for more than six miles, carrying all before it until the Angelinean concentrated so heavily that the rebels were held at bay though their attack still continued with some violence.

A correspondent at St. Johns Camp has also telegraphed the following the same day:

"From all quarters of the Whiteriver Whither came reports of devastation caused by the bombardment of the Christian fleets upon the fortifications near Mic-Wither Janet. So far sixty Angelinean Transports arriving to land troops near Thumelina are reported ashore and on fire or foundered, over one hundred more being damaged by the enemy's terrible gun fire. In these engagements over thirty one thousand lives have been lost so far. This terrible list of fatalities is due to the fact that most of the vessels have been fully exposed to the guns of Fort Gertrude Angeline. Several Angelinean battle ships are missing, however, and it is feared the death toll may be enlarged. The fleet attacking Fort Labrador has suffered severely. In the attack on the forts at Belle Road a whole fleet of Christian gunboats have been destroyed. Attacking the main shore batteries resulted in over fifty big Angelinean battle ships being badly battered, to a being a total loss. The warship, St. Francis has been wrecked in attacking the fort. The St. George has foundered. The dreadnaught Santa Anna is dismasted and derelict off the main coast. Twenty four hundred men of the warship Province were landed at Day Wokee, their ship being struck by a torpedo having foundered near the fort. The men under fire for two whole days and night, and two killed every hour drifted about on the sinking hulk, without food, without shelter, and only by incessant pumping kept her afloat. The shells were constantly sweeping the decks with dreadful effects, and the entire crew fought until the ship almost foundered. Whether their captain perished from exposure. The survivors of the crew said the storm of shell fire from the forts may have done awful damage to the whole attacking fleet. It seems certain many vessels could not escape the disaster when theirs the finest of the war fleet, succumbed."

General Constantinian Aronburg wrote of the situation on September the 18th 1914.

"It certainly would be difficult to exaggerate the awful scenes resulting from the big battles that meet the eye everywhere. The awful situation could not be exaggerated. Probably the loss of life in the battles will exceed any estimate that has been made. In those parts of the two sections of the sections of the city where such destruction by the enemy's repelling bomb fire was the greatest, there still must be scores of thousands of bodies under the debris. At Norma Catherine which was first captured and which was swept clean of every vestige of the many splendid residences that have covered it, the ruin is all enclosed by a towering wall of debris under which many bodies of dead and soldiers of both sides both sides may be still buried. The removal of the wreckage has scarcely been begun because the enemy frustrate all attempts to remove wreckage by their guns of the fortifications. No doubt the story that will be told when this mountain of ruin is finally removed may multiply the awful horrors of the fearful situation of the siege we are compelled to make. As usual usual in great siege calamities the non-combatants we have in the rear of our lines are all dazed and sick of their losses and experiences with an unnatural calmness that would astonish those who do not understand it. I do believe there is still danger of a great epidemic. But the nervous strain upon the millions of refugees as they soon come to realize their condition, may be nearly as fatal. They talk of all friends property and everything that are gone with tearless eyes, making no allusion to the loss of property and friends children loving ones and relatives. But sooner these people will break down under the strain and the Red Cross societies are glad of the force of strong, competent workers, which it has brought to their relief.

Portions of the main sections of the city so far have escaped the greatest severity of the artillery storm and are left partially intact. Thus it may be possible to purchase here nearly all the supplies that may be wanting. Relief also is coming in as rapidly as all the crippled transportation facilities will permit. No one need fear however after seeing the most brave and manly way in which the many refugees are helping themselves, that too much outside aid will be given. In reply to the question what is most needed? I would say 'The most immediate needs are surgical dressings, the ordinary medical remedies and doses of medicines for the sick and wounded.'

One of the Angelinean generals and two of his staff had been reported dead as a result of the great assault upon the left wing of the Angelinean army but however after the battle they happened to be found, having passed through a most thrilling and shocking experience. General George Gross and his two staff were the Angelinean soldiers in search of whom many of the Angelinean scouting parties went into Norma Catherine. The general had a most thrilling experience indeed during the latter battle in which the enemy had not been successful. With his two staff he had been directing his troops to repel the assault of the enemy, when the main force of the enemy's storming assault broke. So fierce was the confusion that ensued on account of the shock that one of the general's staff seized a battle flag valued at $2,000 from a fallen flag bearer and grasping it in his own hands went to the very front of the works and waved it defiantly in the very face of the victorious Angelinean rebels. This defiance checked the enemy but they poured in such a fire that the brave general was wounded and the flag shot to pieces by a storm of bullets. Here the troops under the commanders under General Gross remained until the rebels failed on receiving reinforcements and rushed forward anew and reached the works leaping over like a swarm of gray demons. The Angelineans however battled fiercely clinging to their trenches. Several times they were driven by the pressure of the enemy's assault from the works and fell backward to the rear in confusion, only to be reinforced and rallied against the foe. The shells crashed through their dogged ranks, shattering lines of men and hurling trees and timbers down about them, soldiers on all sides of the general were hot to death or mangled by shell fire, but with grim perseverance the whole Christian line under General Gross held on and rode the storm through. As their columns crushed and bleeding, their whole line turned and the survivors nearly exhausted, the Angelineans soon withdrew and the works and the Christian soldiers were relieved from their perilous position several hours after the second big battle started. Most of the Angelineans had fought so desperately that they were almost stripped of clothing by exploding cartridges and flashes of powder, and many of the wounded soldiers were delirious. The many wounded were taken to the emergency army hospitals where they many of them tossed in delirium until they recovered. During the conflict General Gross who had been so hard pressed had for a time appealed for aid but got none as the messengers had failed to reach the main lines. The terrible scenes were beyond description. Much could be written about the damage done to the besieging Christian lines and during the battle things were so terrible that little thought was given to other places. So in all sections of Norma Catherine and within the very besieging Christian lines and fortified works the damage was so great that any one would not believe that the longest time of work would ever repair it. Thousands more of refugees were coming to the besieging lines from Julio Gallo and other points of Vivian Wokee, and for so many refugees leaving the army and going to Dorothy Gale and Angelinea gathering those two cities were being taxed to the limit to find places for all of them.

Two weeks after the capture of Norma Catherine the first big contingent arrived. There were about eight hundred thousand, and a more forlorn, dejected and suffering lot of people never were brought together during the war before. The scores of thousands of sick were cared for in many hospitals, and also in private homes, and the greater number of the others were assigned to Dorothy Jensen, Betty Robbin, Ozma, and Trot but they apparently could not quiet themselves unless so fatigued and weak from loss of sleep and want of sleep that they practically fell down exhausted.

they even roused the streets of those guardian cities with scarcely any clothing on, men, women, and children, all were hollowed eyed, and sunken cheeked, and on the verge of despair. It was indeed terrible to realize how many thousands of families had been broken out by the "Norma Catherine" sign of terror. Many persons in the cities had listened to so many other harrowing tales until they were actually sick. None of the newspaper reports had been exaggerated. There was really nothing one could say which would express the situation. From the first trains reaching Angelina Agathia it had been reported that even seven million lives had been lost at the battles with Conscientinians. Aronburg and the enemy but at first this was believed to be surely a gross exaggeration. But now many have changed their minds, believing it really a conservative figure. In Vivian Wickey after the day or night of the capture of Norma Catherine and soldiers had grouped their way through the darkness under fire, stumbling over piles of debris, fighting glandelinian ambushes, and after lots of difficulty drove them out. In the day time the soldiers found many of the buildings denuded of everything, the paper being stripped from the ceiling and were hanging in big shreds from the walls. Everything was damp and cold. For weeks the soldiers who were now in possession of Norma Catherine and either slept in the street streets or in the rooms of wrecked houses, but all the windows of many houses had been blown out, and the buildings were so damp and cold that the soldiers hundreds of thousands of them were almost afraid to sleep there. Some of the rooms of the lower parts of the buildings were still flooded. There was not a room in a single house out of any that had not been damaged by the concussion of shell fire, and the ruins of some houses were fairly toppled over and leaned against a neighbors house. There was scarcely a structure in Julio Gallo itself which escaped the fury of the big shell storm. Every high building lost its roof, or every church its steeple, and all were damaged to some extent. The streets for two or three weeks and even longer afterwards, were filled with debris, telephones, and telegraph poles and wires, huge piles of bricks and timbers, tin roofs and all kinds of miscellaneous things, such as furniture, trees, etc were strewn in the streets. Colonel Keenan escaped without injury during the battle in the streets. He declared the accounts of the Vivian Wickey disaster were in no way exaggerated. The debris in some of the streets in Julio Gallo he said was thirty five feet high. Battery D of the Angelinian light artillery came out of the battle with a loss of eighty six men, a loss never sustained in battle with artillery before. The survivors all of whom were wounded had been barracked in a shattered building since the day of the conflict. They were finally sent out to the main rear to be outfitted and retrained. The officers and men lost everything, and even had to scavenge clothing to cover them. And also the most motley crowd of the Angelinian regulars ever seen at attention line up before general picknell was the column of Abyssinkilians under Jesse general Jesse Amos the day after the worse of the battle. Parts of uniforms and clothing which bore no semblance to any uniform were barely sufficient to cover nakedness, and in thousands of cases of the 10,000,000 men there were bad rents which showed the bare anatomy on dress parade.

The general of this splendidly heroic division had reached his lines when the assault of the enemy struck and when it came on had made preparations to meet the foe with artillery and big bombs and with having a strong works felt the safety of the line of troops would be assured. The violence of the enemys assault however had increased so rapidly than after fifteen minutes real resistance the whole line was driven to the second works, and the then on account of the enemy gaining the rear it was impossible to leave the second line of works. It was reported that general Winstons and Vivian whole army was assaulted simultaneously. At this time general Kells division of Abyssinkilians adjoining the one driven to the second line of works recoiled before the enemy. The hole christian line expected disaster. The enemy all the time had been running to the assault like a mill race. The rebels had already carried the first line of works and the waves of glandelinians kept crashing against the defenders of the second line of works and fighting desperately to carry it that the Angelinians were fairly exhausted in their efforts to repel them. Then down along general Avens line came two small advanced glandelinian batteries, whose volleys of grape and a canister struck down a whole regiment of men at one terrible discharge. Another advancing battery came up and sent sweeping into the ranks of the Angelinians a storm of grape that fairly carried away the labor beaten behind with their destruction. Generals Artigue, Johnson, and Hemming of these Angelinian brigades were severely wounded, and their works were fully in the possession of the foe and the Angelinians driven back.

General Jesse Amos was expecting it would be his turn next. He however nevertheless despite it all said, "no matter what happens it is not our time to retreat." Then came the piercing devil yell of the glandelinians followed by an unusual unusually loud crash of musketry as the glandelinians almost swarmed over the second line of works and strove to drive the Angelinians back. Finally however the assailants were repulsed and they recoiled before the galling fire of the Angelinians. Later on to prevent the Angelinians from making a counter charge the enemy broke a dam near the point and the Angelinians could look and see nothing but a flood of water in every direction. In the morning they found their position had been almost carried for the works were strewn with dead glandelinians. All this while there was many cases of pitiful destitution. Many half demented non combatants when the assault was raging too close to their refuge half crazed from fright and the din of battle positively refused to leave the wrecked barracks, and as persistently refused to accept offers of relief extended to them. In many instances parents who had lost their children still occupied the ruins of Norma Catherine itself the ruins of their former homes and surroundings and the horrors of war and the constant killing and exposure had brought them to a state of mental and physical collapse. The number who had gone insane as the result of their awful experiences will probably never be known. In every lot of refugees sent out of the stricken city, there were many thousands of insane men women and even children. The victims at first made light of their awful losses, and laughed immoderately when telling of the deaths of friends and others, or their families, and relatives in the flood, shell fire and battles. It was a very short time from this to uncontrollable madness. The many guards of the Angelinian militia did splendid work in patrolling the captured sections of the city after the storm of battles, and the fears of a dreadful epidemic were allayed by the presence and distribution of medicines and disinfectants.

Governor general sawer of Conscientinians Aronburg staff sent out the following expression of Thanks on behalf of the sufferers of Vivian Wickey;

"In behalf of the people of Galverinia, and those of Vivian Wickey who had been rescued I desire to express my acknowledgements to the people of Abissinnia and her many loyal states for the ready and generous response they have made in coming to the aid of our afflicted people. The numbers of deaths among our soldiers besieging Vivian Wickey, and among the unfortunate refugees also, the amount of destitution, and the loss of property is far greater than had been believed. The Secretary of the Navy at Angelina Agathia had placed an extra fleet of transports at my disposal, and I have in a turn placed it at the disposal of Admiral Zimmermann. The addition of this fleet of transports to the many ships already around the water courses of Vivian Wickey will be able to let us use enough boats to handle supplies and passengers to and from the city. The whole army authorities at Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo are in full control, and every effort had been successfully made to bury the dead soldiers, but no attempts have been made to remove the debris as yet. Contributions of the most liberal character are continually reaching me and there will be no waste of the magnificent contributions coming from the many hands and generous hearts of a sympathetic nation."

Indeed no idea could possibly be formed as to the frightful unusual crush of so many railroad trains bearing relief supplies in and around Vivian Wickey on the christian side of it. Still grew gruesome scenes and most harrowing incidents of the time immediately following the great gale of battle and cannons at Vivian Wickey were graphically portrayed in a letter to Gertrude Angelina from a young girl friend of hers caught in the region of the enemys lines during the battle of Norma Catherine. It was written to Gertrude Angelina or Angelina Aronburg after flight name was who at the time was with Violet and her sisters at Angelina agathia. This little twelve year old girl had been a girl scout in general vivian's army for several years and had left Angelina Agathia for Mansions lines the first month before Concentinian Aronburg's hurricane of battle, and reached there the very evening before the storm came on, reaching the doomed section of Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo just in time to fully participate in the terrible experience she had. Her letter follows:

Norma Catherine, August 12th.

Dearest friend and companion Angelina Aronburg;

Have not had a single minute to write and cannot hardly recollect my thoughts to tell you of the horrible disaster of the siege down here at Vivian Wickey. The armies of Concentinian Aronburg under Ianstien and Gibiananna have succeeded in capturing Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo but at terrific costs. Countless dead in the ruined houses, in the streets beside street barricades, on house tops, the bay and river, strewn with dead bodies. Broken cannons in streets and muskoes. The whole of Norma Catherine demolished by the shell shell fire of Thunbalinla and Gertrude Angoline. Not a single drop of water for the released Inkahanna -- food so scarce that they fled to the Christian lines. If help did not reach us soon there would be great starvation for the survivors. The dead are not being identified at all, there are so many -- the soldiers are throwing them on barges and drays, where they are loaded like cordwood and taken out to sea or to the rivers to be cast into the waves under the noses of the besieging Angelinian ships. I was at one of the wharfs this morning for a short time and saw three human barges loaded with their awful gruesome freight. The bodies are frightfully mangled, and nearly every one of them hide. Go alone knows what soldiers they are, and who they are. The river is full of dead horses, together with human human corpses, blistering in the hot Galverinian summer sun. It will be impossible to remove the millions of dead from the debris for weeks despite the hundreds of thousands at work -- the whole of Norma Catherine and the outside battle fields are more frightful than anything you or your friends the Vivian girls have ever seen. I in three days counted thirty eight thousand bodies taken from one block of houses all dead soldiers purple and the gray. Every one is striving desperately to get the numerous bodies buried or burned and out of the way for fear of a plague. I myself never expected to get out alive alive, but thank God that despite our grim duty in the battle not one of us girl scouts in the regiment was killed or wounded. We were driven from one signal station to another, by the oncoming great waves of Glandelinians. The shelling was going on at the rate of a hundred thousand explosions per hour, and over many points of the battle line the rain of fragments of falling houses, the settling of earth and stone and everything else fell in torrents. Never shall I forget the sight inside Norma Catherine as darkness settled upon us. Every window in the city every point, every street, dark alley and other places spitted fire from discharged mucketry, and the shells making flashes like lightning added to their crashing thunder made the whole city a roaring lighted inferno. I thought of you and Violet and her sisters and your two other friends, and prayed that you might be comforted. The roof of the house I took refuge in is now gone, the walls have fallen around us, but we still have a floor and -- I can tell you it is too horrible. I was once nearly struck by a falling cornice of a building when a shell blew it down. One of my companions who went through the same experience is almost crazy and is in a dangerous condition. I myself have lost everything and now wearing clothes borrowed from some refugee girls who were more fortunate. The stench is terrible. Thousands of horses in the Christian lines without former owners are in the most pitiful condition imaginable wounded, not hardly a drop of water for them to drink, as the river is poisoned by the stench of dead bodies, and the refugees -- I wonder that everybody is not mad at the awful horrors. No account whatever can exaggerate it. It is absolutely necessary that everybody in Angelina do what they can. The city of Norma Catherine is under martial law to protect it from the mob of Glandelinian pigs and vandals. Last night a Glandelinian officer was arrested, with ten packages belonging to Concentinian Aronburg in his pocket. Colonel Weylinger is in command of the protective forces. They had to shoot many Glandelinian spies and vandals to keep the horrible and most daring ghosts of war in control. General Eddie Mogoren is next in full command and is doing noble work. I and my girl scouts have done what we could to help the dying and wounded soldiers and even refugees, when the battle broke out I was on the highest point in Norma Catherine. My own bravery I cannot boast only saved me. The blocks and blocks all around crashing into many cities, not a house remaining -- not a building but is completely demolished -- houses just torn board from board and piled up. I myself have climbed over wreckage fifty to a hundred feet high in the streets to get to places. I think girl scouts were more fortunate than any of the soldiers or the refugees in Vivian Wickey. I think that not one among my regiment at the time their duty was killed though our escape was narrow many times. With the exception of that one all were calm, though I reckon every one quaked inside from the awful snarling din -- I know I did. I am well. Had some thing to eat this morning when I returned to the Christian lines and a little rainwater made into strong coffee. Coffee is plenty in the army but pure water scarce. To day even the flesh slips of many of the bodies as the rescuers and workers take hold to drag them all from the ruins. They are still piling them up in great heaps and burning them. The horrors multiply. I have seen scores of Glandelinian snails shot down in the streets by the soldiers. The stench is untold. Last night the awful smell, the noise of many cannons, the roar of frightful explosions, the continual signal booming, and shrilling, have kept us awake although we were utterly exhausted. The smell fills your throat and mouth, and makes your head ache so. The horrible experiences it will take many years to tell, and more than a whole life time to forget. If you or Violet and her sisters or Janie Turner and Angelina niches could be here to you and they would feel that yours and their anxiety is nothing. It is pitiful to see so many thousands of husbands among the refugees, with a look of despair in their eyes, searching for their wives and children, wives for their loved ones, and most pitiful pitiful of all the comparatively few children -- although they are enough, God and his blessed mother knows to be leftorphans and homeless -- to bring into every one's face, with frightened, appealing eyes. It is heartrending beyond a beyond the extreme. Now I and my comrades are much better off. We are safe, so please don't you and the Vivian girls worry. I hope to hear from you and them soon. Best

Best love and kisses from to all;
Evangeline Neil.

Although General Concentinian Aronburg's vast besieging armies had been struck three times with floods of Glandelinian assaults one big attack on his centre, and two against Viviananna and Wlenation, even this experience and the destructive effects of the offensive cannon fire from batteries and forts was not enough it seemed to convince the Angelinian generals that it might happen again and with disastrous effects the next time. Only Concentinian Aronburg and his best generals has had any idea after the last terrific battle of taking steps to prevent its repetition. It was along Concentinian Aronburg's center in the second storm of battle when the assault of the enemy was so terrific as to enable the Glandelinians to carry a portion of the line of positions and fortified works and rush into the camps in the rear. This was the point where whole brigades of troops were swept away in confusion and panic, leaving hardly enough troops to oppose the enemy's advance. In the rear of the lines where the assault extended the rebel ways was fifteen deep. Had the Angelinian forces demolished by the waves of Glandelinian assault and swept away by its pressure not formed into a great jam in the camps and barracks and extending their withering fire along the works and barracks for seven miles with dreadful effect upon the enemy, the enormous body of assailants would have been swept successfully through the rear, and even then if the battle was won in the end the number of dead, and even wounded soldiers of our own side or the enemy even would have been undrugged. Those barracks and the brave defenders formed like an irrepressible breakwater against a tidal wave, and had it not been for that none of the refugees in the rear of the camps would be in the Christian lines alive now.

The work of extracting bodies of soldiers from the city and mass of wreckage still continued. On September over forty thousand more bodies were taken out of the debris, which lined the interior. With all that that had indeed been done to recover bodies buried beneath or pinned to the immense drift, the work had scarcely started. There was even now to time to dig graves, and the putrefying flesh, beaten and bruised beyond recognition was thrown into the flames. Volunteers for this gruesome work had come fast. Men and soldiers who had avoided the many dead under ordinary conditions were now working with a most vigorous will and energy in putting them away. A large force of Angelinian soldiers were still engaged in removing the dead from the region of Lieghburg Landing, located about sixteen miles southeast of Norma Catherine and four miles west of Jennie Vivian. At this point the force of the explosions of many shells literally hung up in trees soldiers killed in battle on both sides, which were being being coils collected and cremated as fast as possible. On other portions of the vast battlefield of Norma Catherine the searching for and the cremating of bodies of soldiers that either perished or found lodgement there was being prosecuted most vigorously. Under one big pile of wreckage in Julio Gallo twenty hundred bodies of soldiers were taken out and cremated. In another pile a soldier suddenly pulled out the remains of three little girls and one woman and for a moment gazed upon them, then cast them mechanically into the fire. They were his own wife and children. As they slowly burned he watched them with a grim smile until they were consumed and before resuming his work in assisting others in removing other bodies he said to a comrade with perfect calmness and tearless eyes:

"They were my wife and three children, pretty dears indeed. The enemy done that. No Angelinian will receive the slightest mercy from me. I give no quarter. I will have revenge."

The greatest sufferers from the disaster were the people of limited means, who owned homes near the river so close before the enemy took Vivian. There were scores of thousands of these unfortunate people who owned mortgaged lots and property, and had homes constructed by the loan companies, and though their property was swept away by the enemy, the loan companies were protected by lions. General Constantinian Aronburg advised his very army and the nation in general that a fund be immediately raised for people who had suffered this way, that when Vivian is entirely recaptured they might be able to restore what took them many years to accumulate, and which was taken from them and ruined in a single moment. The resources of the many sub-relief stations within the Christian lines were taxed to their utmost capacity and long lines of refugees awaited their turns for provisions and clothing.

At all portions of the rear of the Christian lines troops and guards and sentries and even boy and girl scouts were guarding the entrance to Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo and keeping back all people who could have no good reasons for desiring to go there. Non-combatants or refugees were dailing leaving both sections of the city, a majority being women and children and eight seers who eluded the guards on the main approaches upon their arrival were pressed by force into the street services. There was no place for any man who would not work. It was work or go to the prisons, and they generally went to work.

When one of the relief trains reached the vicinity of Jennie Vivian, which is on the main stream of the gunbeam Creek it was found that of those who survived the flood, disaster of battle and the shell storm the majority of soldiers and even non-combatants were severely injured. Most of them were bruised and maimed, indeed presenting a most pitiful sight, their limbs lacerated and bleeding.

All bemoaned the fate of those dear to them. Many of the countless dead, got your head--and the river beaches were strewn with them--had their faces and head even mutilate mutilated so that it was impossible impossible to learn the names of any of those soldiers or even dead refugees who found their resting place in the crude trenches hurriedly dug. A headboard was placed on the grave in every instance giving as nearly as possible age and accurate description. It was found necessary in many instances to bury sixteen or in one grave. Those who survived the wreck, were homeless and had nothing to eat since the disaster. As most of them were injured it was not possible possible for them to organize a movement on their own part.

Life and sustenance was furnished these survivors in order that they might not swell the list of dead. Not most of all the bodies found in and around the vicinity of the places were supposed to have been killed in battle.

When Concentinian Aronburg had with the help of his armies captured Norma gathering and Julio Gallo, and W. Jonsien had seized the fortifications of Maya he decided to force the fortifications of Gertrude Angelina and Thumelina at all costs, while at the same time he would put his armies through and have them capture other portions of Vivian Wickey. He plan took several days to be made out, and the path of the advance was to be about forty seven miles in extent and was to be made simultaneously. On the morning of September the 23th when the plans were carried through the big divisions thus prepared for the move, and covered a by a general cannonading of a hundred thousand big guns moved forward, and advanced westward across the pontoon bridges of the Norma gun river, and sped through the glens and wooded country moving against fortress Thumelina and Gertrude Angelina, while the other columns under general Towan, Ciconsinia, and Maldon moved against the main glandelinian defenses of Julio Gallo. The attack at these points came upon the enemy almost without warning, but it was repelled with terrific violence. All day long the battle raged, the shell fire of both sides creating most terrible woe and havoc, and the many columns of Angelinians were repulsed with the most dreadful losses, as the guns of Fortress Cedernine, Lucille Jackson, Vivian and Aurandecallio joined in and at this time of the war it became the wildest battle and the fiercest artillery conflict that ever raged in Western Calvernia. The cannon fire of the Angelinian batteries caused among the glandelinians however great loss of life and property among the fortifications was badly damaged.

At the time that this was going on the fleets of besieging and attacking christian ships had went into unusual activity with the purpose to help Concentinian Aronburg and therefore Vivian Wickey was the place of the widest and most extensive battles of the entire war. The following dispatches received by general Concentinian Aronburg from his generals showed how wide spread was the fury of this titanic conflict:

"Your Excellency general Aronburg;

Immense damage was done to a portion of the Mic-Whirther fortifications and other defended points of the seaboard of Vivian Wickey by the attacking christian fleets whose cannons opened with great violence, and threw a perfect torrent of high explosives upon the fortress of Thumelina by waterside, and simultaneously bombarded Cedernine, Mic-Whirther, Angelina Aronburg and Mic-Whirther Janet. The din was most terrific and shook the shore of the whole region like an earthquake. Fires broke out by the thousands, big explosions tore great mountains of debris into the air, and part of the fortress of Thumelina is badly breached. Reports by signal from Kauffman Beach says that by the cannon fire of Zismannus Abboannian fleet every big dock of the city's waterfront had been destroyed by fire or blown up, and all the big fire rafts sent down against it by the rebels together with an attacking glandelinian fleet of twenty ships dromonights were completely wrecked in attacking the fleet. Outside of this region our observation towers have witnessed the land assaults of perfect waves of Angelinian troops upon fortress Gertrude Angelina and in meeting the onslaught of one big column of winkle Abyssin kilians the glandelinian artillery fire from Thumelina attained a velocity of seventy two thousand shell and grape per hour, mingled with the storming fire of musketry fire from the outer works. Reports of a frightful repulse of the assault and enormous losses and fatalities have come in. It is useless to assault these fortresses as in that one day too many were killed to dare estimate. I have seen many regiments return to their own works with flags torn and tattered, uniforms ripped and millions of wounded streaming to the rear. Every regimental and brigade commander is killed, and seventeen divisions 1 divisional generals are wounded. Wansien himself is injured and his loss is unaccountable. Fortress Gertrude Angelina I'm sure is the strongest of the Lucille Jackson fortifications there is."

Another dispatch was this from an observation signal station; You Excellency general Aronburg;

The flag ship of Admiral James Mic-holleston arrived at the point of Maldon, took at one P.M. this afternoon from the attack on fortress Aurandecallio by gonestic gun river near the gonestic seas. She left with the whole fleet from the terrible bombardment yesterday morning, and the admiral reports a fearful time, and half of his fleet crippled, the fleet lost ninety ships out of two thousand, and the loss in life is dreadful. Fortress Aurandecallio is burning, or at least her barracks, but the main works and redoubts holding out like a volcano disembowling itself. The Admirals wife and daughters came here from Angelina Agathia and is near the river docks waiting to meet her husband when the ship arrives for repairs. The meeting between the two was affecting. All this morning anxious watches of the men of the Angelinian siege shore batteries waited on the bluffs at the mouth of the Nonestic river for a glimpse of the shattered warships. Many people also had friends and relatives among the marines and sailors on the ships and as the hours wore on and no sign of ships and crew their anxiety became intense. 10,000 soldiers or marines and sailors lost their lives in that dreadful attack on Aurandecallio on sea board and many ships are dismantled or their masts, their smoke stacks, gone and all guns dismantled or broken up and their turrets destroyed. The din was so terrific from shelling and the explosions of bombs, and guns, and the awful explosions of mined flaming fire rafts, that the water of the river is choked up with fishes killed by the shock. I for one bet over a full fortune that fortress Aurandecallio will never be captured on land side either. The assault of the fleet was broken down with disaster. All the captains of every ship is wounded, Admiral Mic-holleston is disabled and one hundred thousand marines are wounded and crowding the transports. It was an awful scene, and all for nothing."

Admiral James Gale."

"Your Excellency general Concentinian Aronburg;

As a result of the furious assaults of your columns under general Francis Vivian which swept over the enemys ten miles of outer works beyond Julio Gallo to day amid the most frightful carnage, the glandelinians who defended them most doggedly were forced back, but half of your assailing columns in this location are prostrated with their shocking losses, and the enemy off from all sections are preparing to counter attack and regain all they lost to night.

During the height of the battle here the attack reached way into the enemys main line of works but could get no further though all sections of Julio Gallo are in their hands now and many people are refugees toward your lines having been released by force from the enemy. I saw one battery of the glandelinians from fortress Bobbin now down a whole line of its assailants. As night is approaching I believe the fury of infantry fighting is subsiding like the quieting down of a storm, but the roar of artillery along a line of batteries twenty miles in extent is roaring terribly and the sky is stabbed terribly by lightning flashes of bursting bombs and high explosives, and the uproar is ear-splitting. It will presume take many more weeks to capture Vivian Wickey entirely."

Up to noon today the big fleet of Angolinian transport ships have not been heard from. They were due here at seven o'clock this evening. The transport steamer Angeline, due at the Mic-Mollerster Run about the same hour has not arrived yet either. The battle on the assaulting fleets attacking Andrew fortress had raged with a cross fire from the shores of the river, and from fortress St Phillip, and the fire of these fortresses had come upon the attacking ship with such intensity that few vessels were caught prepared and many were damaged. It is the purpose of the enemy no doubt that in case Vivian, Ickey is captured, to destroy the box besieging fleets so as to escape down the river to Hanley's army further away. The Angolinian flagship, Cornelia lost her smokestack, and two gun turrets in the explosion of one shell from Andrew. Other ships have not yet arrived not having been heard of and they have been in the worse of the artillery fight. In the terrible fight the battleship, Glenda stranded near Joe Krum, but was washed off the rocks. Many vessels are lost.

Another dispatch was;

"Your Excellency General Aronburg;

A terrific attack of Angolinians under general Picknell caused the capture of other portions of the city at about midnight, the attack being covered by a terrific artillery fire. All to the enemy at this point seems lost and the Glendelins are all fleeing into Andrean, Angolinia Aronburg and Mic-Wirthier fighting desperately from house to house, and street to street. The scenes are awful but we are winning."

"His aiding general."

Again this was the wording of still another dispatch h"

Your Excellency General Conscientinian Aronburg;

It is probable that the tail end of your assaulting line struck a north western section of the Aurandebondis fortress about eleven o'clock this afternoon with great force and fury and continued until early this morning. The loss to the troops is heavy but the fortress is now in our hands."

Again came another dispatch h--

Your Excellency General Aronburg

The Abbisannian battleship Ailbern was on fire and driven ashore by the rebel guns and captured at seven o'clock this evening, east of the main batteries of the rebels on shore. The crew however escaped. The firing from the fortresses are continuing wildly and all the transport shipping attempting to redeave wounded have suffered heavily, many sailors and marines being drowned."

Still again was another dispatch--

"Your Excellency Conscientinian Aronburg;

The storm of artillery fire did exceedingly great damage on a portion of the Mic-Wirthian fortifications on the land side, and several divisions of Glendelins are reported killed and two of the better batteries of the fortress dismounted. It is still holding out however. But two sections of the city north of Julio Gallo Gallo are in the possession of Angolinians now. The fierce attack passed through many portions of the fiercely defended city and the enemy firing upon their attackers from roofs, windows and every portion of the houses, and from innumerable street barricades, and even from under sewers and catch basins destroyed many lives among the Angolinians in the north section of the city and neighborhood, the shelling of fortress Picillo Icksen in the effort to drive out the Abbisannians doing great damage to the buildings, and wrecking a long line of transports in the river near by. The attack was fitful and fierce and the awful firing was in tremendous gusts. The advances of the Angolinians however was met with fiercest resistance imaginable, and from some big firing fire raging in the city an occasional tongue of flame but darkened over head in the sky. At three o'clock in the afternoon all signs of the enemy had disappeared, though from the continued shell fire the heavens assumed a forbidding look, and the awful thunder from many thousands of cannon fairly rolled. The increased violence of the cannonade seemed to carry everything before it. No one seemed to dispute the rights of the exploding shells in the streets but the Angolinian soldiers only, and the shock of so many explosions threw down wires innumerable. Badly crippling the rest of the telephone and telegraph service in the city. From the very rear end of Julio Gallo the Angolinians being victorious continued the progress of the advance, but the artillery fire of the enemy was too hot the fury of the Christian storm of advance was steadily diminish diminishing in intensity. The attack diminished after leaving Julio Gallo and was pushing on for Belderiina but increased with wonderful rapidity after reaching the enemy's outer works and storming it. The attack here reached the greatest fury of the whole battle but was unsuccessful. The main attack was stopped ear Andrean."

Perhaps even the non-Christian section of the whole world in this story was not half so bad as it had been supposed by the Angolinian nation or so terribly heartless and indifferent as many of the worse or slight test of the pessimists could have made the Angolinian governments believe. Ordinarily men and women in many nations in the whole world have enough to do generally in attending to their own affairs, expecting others of course to do the same, and consequently they pay very small attention to what is going on around them, but when their hearts are really touched they drop everything and rush to the rescue of the afflicted. So it was in the case of the scores of millions of still incoming refugees at Vivian Ickey, the horrible series of battle artillery and other catastrophes at Vivian Ickey, and throughout the whole of Calverinia, and northern Angolinia served to bring conspicuously into notice the best and worse sides of all human nature, which was always and always the common results of all appalling disasters. The people again relieve themselves from captivity from other sections of Vivian Ickey by the other Angolinian drives as far as Andrean, were suddenly overwhelmed by the almost unprecedented unprecedented a fury of the worse cannonadings and battles in the central western sections of Calverinia. Thousands more of the non-combatants were killed or injured. Hundreds of thousands more lost homes and places of business. They were for years suffering with dire hunger on account of the enemy refusing to give but what they were compelled to give, and many times Vivian Ickey had been menaced with pestilence and other horrors. All were during the siege brought to a common level by dangers of every description, death in its most awful forms, and an outlook of terrible uncertainty. And yet in the midst of all this ruin and suffering they were harassed by by Glendelinian thugs spies, vandals, and thieves and ghouls in human shape, who wanted wantonly looted property of both sides, assaulted and killed citizens who resisted them and despoiled and disfigured the dead soldiers in a shocking manner to secure anything they could find and plans and other things. Devoid of any feeling because they were enemies of Christians and Heaven in general, having no common sense or pity the Glendelinian spies and vandals seized upon this awful disaster as an opportunity to enrich themselves with stolen plans from generals and anything they could secure to insure the perfect and safe holding out and defense of Vivian Ickey. As soon as the Angolinian Authorities however could regain full possession of Vivian Ickey and the Christian tribunals could recover from the shock of the battles and disasters, and as the two sections and other points were in the hands of the Christians the whole place was placed under strong martial law and the hundreds of thousands of troops patrolling every street of the city and other points did not hesitate one moment to kill every one of the vandals caught in the commission of his most infamous work for their still more wicked generals. Public opinion sustained this prompt style of punishment. It was a real species of literal Glendelinian lynching taken up by the Angolinians themselves to which no objection was ever raised by any one.

the horrible disaster also brought into prominence the greed and mercenary passion of human nature. A clique of ravenous glandelinian wretches was taking advantage of the fact that all of ivian wickey was cut off from wire river and bridge and railroad communication conspired to secure control of the retransportation facilities by water, and so all the fresh provisions in the city were ruined by the desperate besieged, leaving only a few canned and dried articles which were available for food. General ivian wickey however proved himself equal to the emergency, and by having his cavalry make great raids confiscated the food supply of the rebel non-combatants of ivian wickey, and compelled the glandelinian owners of every business district to give up all their supplies and go to their own friends or share in the horrors of war without evening having a chance to get out of ivian wickey. Of course this was the very dark side of human nature but the picture had its most bright side also. The news of the sudden capture of ivian wickey and of the enemy being driven to all their fortresses and out toward Angelina Aronburg and Andros had hardly appeared in the public prints throughout the nation before tens of millions of helping hands at once were busy collecting relief. The chief executive of the Angelinian Nation, the governors of every state, and the Mayors of every city issued their appeals "new to the people whose sympathies were already aroused and whose hearts and hands were ineluctably generous in the work of relief with the greatest enthusiasm ever known. Far off countries still sent in their offerings, every city and town in the world where Angelinians lived contributed in the help of carrying on the recapture of ivian wickey, and crowned heads, hastened aid, and to cable sympathy with the Angelinian cause, together with more substantial evidences of their kindly feeling, and mostly all children of many a nation gave what they could and went through sacrifices as much in their power for that end. Without delay of any kind instantly and spontaneously, the machinery of charity began its work, the people of the northern sections of Calvernia and Abyssinile in the presence of such a dreadful visitation of the war, involuntarily suffering and death asserted itself in giving everything possible, as well as arms and provisions and ammunition and all things else were forgotten. Even now day by day trains that could speed from every part of the Angelinian country to Calvernia to sent aid to her and to support in the recapture of ivian wickey, all loaded with supplies, ammunition, weapons, soldiers and Red cross nurses and doctors, and all still going telegraph wires carried orders for money, testifying to the unanimity of the great work of relief, and to the higher and more noble instincts of human nature, when it is appealed to by the claims of humanity. Now even the ghouls who were once many thousands in parts of ivian wickey were now very few in number and the generous sympathizers of the poor refugees and of the Angelinian cause were to be counted by the scores of millions. Even many millions of convicts in various prisons in all nations except glandelinia were moved by the sufferings of the war stricken Calvernia country, to contribute four forty million dollars to the relief fund. go are all men who really go to prison totally bad. the scope and rapidity of the ivian wickey relief work all over the world and all over the Angelinian countries afforded a spectacle at once gratifying and noteworthy. Trains laden with food and comforts for the sufferers among the refugees were rushed toward the besieged city from every quarter of Angelina. From Angelina, (Angelina, from Sacramento Abbeanna, from Dorothy Gale-Angelina, nearly every city not ruined by the foe or in their possession regardless of size contributed its biggest quota to the generous cause, even little children. Even from across the wide Angelinian seas, the countries of Blomlinia and wickencle though slightly lukewarm in their sympathy to glandelinia's cause, funds came for the stricken at ivian wickey with regrets from the kings of the nation that such a disaster to the Angelinians had to occur and a full desire in their hearts that ivian wickey will be speedily recaptured and the rebellion crushed and thrown down.

For even with a view to the capture of ivian wickey the whole christian army besieging the place was in possession of a magnificent relief fund that went far toward alleviating the awful mental and physical sufferings of the human scores of millions of war refugees. Here therefore is a great social phenomenon that may give pause to all critic critics who are always wont to inveigh against the Angelinian Commercial and Industrial age. These exhibitions of liberality were not rare in the United States either. A long series of them might be compiled within the period of the Angelinian Agatha fire, and the Francis Atlanta disaster and battle. Probably the increased willingness of the people of the nations of Angelina and the world in general to help the stricken communities of war like ivian wickey, Evangelina St. Iare, Jennie Richee, and elsewhere is or was due more to the railroads and repaired telegraph lines than to anything else. Modern charity in the child always of modern conditions. These indispensable adjuncts to commercial enterprise alone makes widespread relief work possible. If the telegraph or the war correspondents and newspaper reports employed commissionally by the armies had not placed the sad picture at Conventinian Aronburgs orders of ivian wickey a misfortune it once before the eyes of Angelinians from ocean to ocean, and of the nations there could have been no such impulse of general sympathy. About nine months before probably a great explosion at ivian wickey brought on calamity to the Angelinian besiegers, but on account of the enemy having then severed every means of communications it was two months and a half that had elapsed before news of the disaster had been known and relief carried to the sufferers. The impulse to give cannot thrive under such circumstances. Of course there has been tender hearts in all ages, but only when things have been repaired what the enemy had damaged on the means of railroads and wires, and other communications have the means of quick communications made human sympathy effective across the Angelinian countries torn by the awful war. The repaired railroads, the repaired and replaced telegraphed as far as possible possible, and the war correspondents, and newspaper men have lengthened the army of charity, quite as much as that of a common business. The ivian wickey incidents are fine examples of the way in which these agencies bind all sections of the loyal parts of the Angelinian nation together in increasing solidarity, and not only give relief funds for the sufferers but exert all their means to cause a speedy fall of ivian wickey and the defeat or capture of the vast glandelinian armies situated there.

The great value of the Angelinian secret service signal stations at all portions of the beleaguering lines and the remarkable correctness of their observations, all things considered was demonstrated by the events proceeding and succeeding the terrific battle of Porto Red Riding Hood near Jennie ivian. The signal stations in that location gave warning of the enemy's intended movements against general ivian's left wing hours before the frightful assault manifested itself against his whole line, and gradually extended along the whole of general ivian's line of works and his fortifications. The signal stations though incessantly under shell and musketry fire, anticipated the course of the assaulting goodlier and bombardment glandelinian waves from the vicinity of Lieghburg Landing until it reached Tataria and Evangelina Grand Junction, where from the intensity of the long lines of christian artillery fire the rebel tidal wave was compelled to make a deflection no human skill could have foreseen. The men operating the signal stations were not caught napping however. They sent out their warnings and signals both for the whole stretch of christian positions at Jennie ivian, and the whole of Conventinian Aronburgs left wing and general line of siege and when the storming glandelinian assault turned from the southwest, the signal stations turned their attention to general ivian's positions and ivian's line and on the following morning thirty three hours before the terrible battle warned the two generals of the enemy's intention to make a general assault along their whole line, and during that day extended the signals all along the main christian line of Conventinian Aronburgs besieging armies, thus preventing any general from being surprised by an attack anywhere in case one came.

Of course the observers and men of the signal corps could not know what terrible energy the attack would gain when the glandelinians in almost overwhelming numbers crossed the Sunbeam creek, and swept with great violence against the whole line of battle.

Perhaps still greater accuracy in forecasting was displayed by the line of signal stations in the warnings given out to the main christian fleets on the wickey bay and in the river mouths on the same morning. Though nearly all lines of communications in the whole region were cut off, the signal stations and scouting parties, and the boy and girl scouts kept track of the advancing waves of glandelinians as they advanced through toward Liephburg Landing, and gave timely warning that the main force of the assault would be directed against general Vivian's main line at Jennie Vivian and Ev'n Evangelina Granis junction, with other columns moving across the river at other points in an endeavor to take him on his rear. It further predicted the furious attacks which prevailed that awful day, their maximum ferocity, the change caused by the concentration of heavy masses of art and artillery against the assailants, and the falling back of the immense waves of glandelinians torn and mangled. Every general of the brigades and divisions and every officer had ample warning given him. The battle was a terrible one and raged for three days with dreadful violence. The enemy gained works near High Liephburg Landing but were blown out by general Vivian's art and artillery. The assault in general came upon Vivian's main line at all points, like the succession of waves seen striking the shore in stormy weather, but the waves of glandelinians were totally broken up and demolished amid the thunder of thousands of guns, and the flaming lines of musketry. The attack of the enemy was finally repulsed with dreadful loss to both sides and Vivian's army was severely wounded and thirty six of his divisional generals and other commanders killed or wounded. The enemy losses were heavier and Min-Alister struck who led it in person was so dangerously wounded that he had to be replaced by general Purragatorian, and the former sent secretly out of Vivian's army to be attended elsewhere. It was a disastrous battle especially to the enemy and general Purragatorian realized that Vivian's army was bound to fall sooner or later. In times before it was the habit to jeer at the signal station corps and at their abilities, and whenever a certain prediction failed of verification to condemn the office officers of the signal station Bureau as unreliable and not worth the expense of the lives lost there, and of its maintenance. During the past years of the war however, its operators have gained in skill and the record of the signal corps is of a character of which its officials have every reason to be proud and which amply justifies whatever expenses it may entail by its great saving of the army from disaster and total defeat.

The appalling nature of the wreck of the glandelinian armies at Vivian's army which the whole garrisons of many a fortress also was reduced, and of the awful defeat at the second battle of Liephburg Landing naturally led to some talk among the various glandelinian generals of abandoning the whole of Vivian's army entirely and retreating somewhere to the main fortifications on the mainland. One of the chief high army officers concluded in his report to the Congress of A Vivian's army by expression the opinion that the glandelinian armies were licked and demolished beyond the ability to recover, and also that most of the garrisons of fortress Gertrude Angelina and Thum Thumbelina and others were said to be in favor of leaving the main fortifications on the outskirts of Julio Gallic to the support of the Angelinian forces and heading a movement to strengthen the garrisons of the Li Lucille Jackson and Mic-Thurber and resist the Angelinian tide with all their strength there.

It was natural that the arrive surviving armies of Vivian's army who were driven into the Angelina Aronburg, Mic-Thurber and Andean sections should consider or agree to the abandoning of such a perilous site as their general believed there could never now be any complete security against such a disaster like the last days. But still it was more surprising to say that general Purragatorian who succeeded Min-Alister struck did not intend to desert any spot of Vivian's army's surface because of a sudden and rare convulsion of Angelina. He declared that not even Calverline Angelina held by glandelinian armies still there was not abandoned because of the disastrous explosion near the S Zee Mac Run that killed fifty thousand glandelinians in the second year of the war.

The war and explosion disasters in Central and Eastern and Eastern Calverline had not induced the glandelinians to abandon a single city in their possession. When the army of 100,000,000 glandelinians were assembled up in the most terrific contest in the east with dreadful loss of life and wounded it did not change the site of the besieged city or the defenders, nor have the still more disastrous conflicts and explosions and other disasters along portions of the Mic-Jollister run ever caused the Glandelinian survivors to change their position. They held on like leeches. The situation thus showed that both the glandelinians and the Angelinians really the same kind of people but arrayed against each other were as tenacious as the other. The glandelinians besieged so long at Crowley continued to resist besiegers and the like in spite of all past disasters, despite facing famine, and disease and the glandelinians at Calverline (Calverline) were not disheartened when the besieging armies there committed fearful ravages.

Representatives of the Glandelinian Continental Congress now in Andean agreed in saying in a meeting held at Andean that the whole Glandelinian army would hold out here in spite of the terrible experiences and that not one fort would give even if it is a prison faced annihilation. They believed that Vivian's army injured though her defending armies had been would be some day later recaptured, without the aid of general Manley and his great local armies somewhere then in southwestern Calverline after his defeat at Anna Maria or Francis Atlanta. General Killmell said he felt certain that Vivian's army and all her outer works and fortress Maya covered by Thumbelina would soon be recaptured. The new energy and courage displayed by the Angelinian rebels holding Vivian's army so long as what was to be expected in a city so full of Angelinian pluck though insurgents. Though stunned and prostrated by big defeats and by the most fatal disasters of the war that had ever taken a Glandelinian army anywhere, the remaining glandelinian armies and the garrisons and the Vivian's army section still held out only a few days to regain breath. The Glandelinians being mostly Angelinians but enemies of the Angelinian federal governments, and wicked as possible had simply shown the same indomitable courage and dogged determination and will power by which Angelinians in times past built up a great nation, where there were big wildernesses as many centuries ago. General Purragatorian said in his speech "There is no reason why Vivian's army should not be speedily recaptured and our garrisons make our homes on the present site of ruins. That the city and our armies are ruined beyond recovery find no sympathy among the armies of our cause. As soon as possible Norma O Catherine and other sections will be recaptured, and we will also hold out at our former positions till the last man. Nothing but the order of our government at Glandelinia and that alone will cause us to abandon the place. And then even then we can say that the Angelinians have not driven out our armies. We wait out to obey the orders of our government."

Jennie Vivian with a small river stretch of sixty five miles can be plainly noticed outside of a wooded territory near Vivian's army. To the south is an unbroken sea of lane landscapes, small towns and villages and farms for eight hundred miles. Already the christian armies after handling general Purragatorian's army so roughly had swept westward, with a fury that nothing could withstand to follow up the advantages they had gained. This attack came against the rebel positions so west of Jennie Vivian and though the rebel cannon fire wrought terrible havoc among the christian surges the assault was one and the glandelinians were compelled to recoil. The other section of the assault ing Angelinian waves of troops reached the Glandelinian works held by general Louisa and crashed against his lines like a cyclone. The left wing of the charging Angelinian front was fairly flooded with shells explosions and a storm of musketry to boot with terrible loss of life, while general Indianola's brigade was destroyed but here also the assault gained success the survivors going over the works and carrying all before them, and driving the Glandelinians pell-mell. The most monstrous line of Angelinian troops ever seen preceded this attack, forcing the fiercely battling glandelinians back to a great distance in advance of the main line. The firing of the still resisters became a tempest, precipitating death and destruction but the advance of the glandelinians could not be stopped. Here now was all the terrible character of a violent battle, the tremendous firing of cannons and musketry, the thrashing onslaughts, the lightning sheets of flashing musketry, cannon and exploding shells, the bellowing thunder of great explosions, and the annihilating storm of grape and canister that seems to be dashed from mighty tanks with the force of titans against the christian assailants.

However for a time when the enemy had recoiled further the firing had ceased, the lightning of exploding shells, flakes of anon and musketry and destruction ceased tempo temporarily and the thunder of cannon only bellowed in the distance at some other resort. There was a lull in the terrific battle. However it was only short for it passed quickly, and the glandelinians having received reinforcements and having rallied with as little warning as preceded its lull the battles fury closed in again, but with the attack in an opposite direction, the enemy attacking this time and the whole so one suggested a double or redoubled reversal of all that had gone before. No battle possible in the region of Ivian Wickey so far presented the terrors that accompanied this one. The attack on Norma Catherine and her capture was confined to a narrow point and was short in duration and had no long ending but reached a quick climax. But the fury of this battle however grew and grew, and now the glandelinians were counter attacking with a fury that hardly nothing could withstand it and the Angolinians began to recoil now one point at a time. The fall of general Indianola and the loss of so many men had kept the other christian generals uneasy ever since but now however the attack of the enemy was soon repulsed, and a big glandelinian force which had swept around Jennie Ivian to strike Ivianama 1 on the flank was captured after being surrounded and fighting with terrible fury all day in their vain efforts to escape.

The glandelinian authorities however made a settlement that at the abandonment of the other sections of Ivian Wickey would not be made without a fiercer struggle than ever, for many months the glandelinian glandelinian generals had been admitting that twice in their memory during the siege when general Henson was in command that his own Angolinians had fought their way in and through Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo, causing death and destruction, but as sturdily as their conservation prompted they had fought back the Angolinian armies, drove them out of the two sections and also stoutly insisted that the Angolinian armies could never make such progress again. Yet the glandelinian generals gave no consistent reason for their presumptuous belief. The siege of Ivian Wickey was not breached by even the wildest assaults, a hundred small outer works of fortifications, especially Protestia and others fell into the possession of the besiegers after many desperate and terrible struggles, the force of the attacks of the besiegers was as boundless as before, the artillery fire of hundreds of great batteries still continued to dominate all approaches to the christian lines and Ivian Wickey put the belief of the generals spread, and the fury of the siege battles grew, grew, and developed now into this horror, and still parts held.

So now what was the future of Ivian Wickey and its results when recaptured by the besieging armies. In addition to the abandonment of Fortress Maya, are the stories of both the horrors of the frontal sections of Puellie Jackson on the twenty seventh of September and of Fortress Silverbell, a great, long line of redans near Lake Angeline. In the desperate battle of September 27th the glandelinians who defended the fortress of Silverbell and its outer works were overwhelmed and three hundred thousand lives among both sides were lost in this hurricane of war and humanity. General Hearnar Lafocadio was the commander of the first assaulting columns and he was killed and his divisions hurled back in confusion. When this battle broke out called the battle of Silverbell the blue abyss of sky seemed to have yawned over the world more deeply than ever before making one of the fairest and grandest days ever known before. The glandelinians at Fortress Silverbell had thought from the unusual quietude that nothing unusual was going to happen but a sudden change touched the beautiful scene--the swaki swaying shadow of some vast motion. There had been queer sounds far away early in the day and then there had seemed far to the right in front a whole mountain of smoke and debris seemed to rise bodily up at the sky, the wrinkled horizon line of landscape not far from the christian positions seemed lifted to a straight line, the line far away darkened and approached--a monstrous, immeasurable fold of purple motion moving as swift as a cloud shadow pursued by sunlight.

But the formidable line by startling contrast with the woods moved slowly as it nears the main approaches to the longline of Silverbell Redan, and then comes a sound as of low rich thunder somewhere as a portion of the line decays itself out in sheets of purple moving forward in long broad wedges or columns. Swift in pursuit another immense line followed--a third--a feeble fourth, then the ground from a noise somewhere sways a little, and everything was stilled again. Irregularly the strange war phenomenon continues to repeat itself, each time with heavier billowings of men, and briefer intervals of quiet, until at last the whole sea of purple far before the works grows restless, and shifts in form, become shorter in column, and change form. The garrisons of these fortifications knew there must have been a "great battle" somewhere that day. Still the strange tidal wave of purple swelled, and light a splendid surf and like a splendid surf made the scene beautiful.

Then just at sunrise a beautiful cloud bridge grew up above the wooded trees and arched over the sky with a single span of cottony, that changed and deepened color with the increasing brightness of coming day. And along the left the cloud bridge extended and approached, strained and swung around at last to make way for the coming of the horror. Then the defenders saw what is up. Heavy columns of overhead overwhelming numbers of Angolinian assailants are moving against their works. Then the battle begins to rage from the left. All that day long, through the night and into the morning again and all the rest of the day, the attacks continued from the Angolinian Angolinians with frightful violence, amid cannon thunders of both sides that tremble the earth like a quaking. Many a time a division of glandelinians are driven from the works. Barracks of the camps rock from the concussion of the cannonading, and some fall in. A chimney once in a while tumbled. Then, explosions wrenched off butters from the windows, and demolished the verandas of the head quarters of some of the glandelinian generals. Light or heavy roofs were lifted by solid shot, dropped again, or flapped in ruin by grape shot and shell--branches of trees were battered and many fell across the works. And still the battle grew louder and fiercer with every passing hour. And so on and on the Angolinians in terrible numbers rush to the assault, like a wind driving the sea head on and heaping the ocean against the land.

All the region was turned into a roaring inferno and still the battle went on. At the same time the glandelinians blew up one of their big secret mines in an endeavor to stem the overwhelming assault and a levee of the McPollester gun was burst. Small bays and penes were swollen into abysses of foam, the smaller streams were pegorged, the river marshes changed into roaring wastes of water. Before Jennie Ivian the mile broad gunbeam river rose sixteen feet above its highest water mark. Small lakes strove from the flood pouring into them to burst their boundaries. Far off rivers steamers or transports tugged wildly at their cables--shivering like tethered creatures that always hear by night the approaching howl of their destroyers.

The assault is repulsed, flood and firing of cannons and musketry have done the work. And swift in the wake of such horror come more spoilers of the dead--savagely of the rebels, spies and vandals to do their dead in the face of all danger, here to plunder for all men and wild birds. Then soon the tremendous tragedy is over.

The horrors of the destruction of Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo had been accomplished. Every seaboard section of the city of Ivian Wickey south or west of the McWhirtherian fortifications that was not more than five hundred yards from the seashore was destined to destructive convulsions caused by the hook of bombardment bombardments and terrific cannonading. This part was still in possession of the foe. One of the grandest horrors of the siege was the flooding of Angolinian Aronburg by the destruction of two dams, and the city continued continuously under shelling for weeks. The glandelinian armies under generals James Galvestonia, Frank Orleana, Moblier, Agustina Frank, and many others were in danger of starvation or capture and the total destruction of the garrison of Fortress York Junction was the grandest horror of the battle.

The shock or convulsions of the awful cannon-dings of the siege was felt a few certain long th down the Calvernia coast, the shock at the nearest point being terrible and felt even in the region of the ploughmen and the king's island, and extended from the coast of Abyssinile down along a portion of the coast of northern northern Angolinia. It was calamitous at some points which showed that Vivian Wickley was in immediate danger beyond a doubt. The lower coast of Calvernia suffered severely on account of the convulsions. A mighty tidal wave of Angolinian soldiers struck the western section of the Thambolinia fortress, and severely injured the garrisons but did not cause the capture or fall of the works. Fortresses Angeline bat laGerta Gertrude Angeline was assailed by the onerous waves of assailants again, and the whole region was terribly shaken by the violence of the battle and the cannonading.

From the shore line of Angolinia back to Calvernia all central Angolinia and Abyssinile have been severely shaken by the awful horrors and convulsions of the numerous battles of Vivian Wickley, Angolinia Agathia so far away suffered with great severity during the time of the awful cannonading of the Mic-Thurthor Janet fortresses and elsewhere when the shock was felt for three thousand miles along four coast lines, but the city of Dorothy Gale only received a slight portion of the severe shocks. Emma and Fred also suffered severely, now Norma Catherine and Julio Gallio are overwhelmed, and are in a dangerous condition and constant under shell fire--the question now arises between total and partial destruction. Vivian Wickley seems to be the awful calamity of the war. For the time being Angolinia A Aronburg only had the rebound of the tidal wave of Angolinian assaults. The shock and vibration passed up the Mic-Holleston gun over from two hundred and three hundred miles, and struck the whole shore line with destructive force. From the results of the Mic-Thurthor Janet horror in the early part of the third year of the war, when the fleets were repulsed with such frightful destruction the coast line suffered most terribly some towns were entirely ruined, Angeline (Angolinia) severely injured, and Gloria suffered more severely, one town was wiped out and hundreds of other places suffered from the severe disaster. It is without the slightest doubt that such horrible disasters of war will reoccur.

Until the horrible cannons of the besieged wreaked their vengeance upon the fair sections of Captured Vivian Wickley and the Christian lines in general and the fury of the Vivian Wickley battles vented their wrath upon the unoffending population, the awful disastrous battle of Francis Atlanta already written in the last chapters which occurred so recently was the most frightful calamity known in the Glandio Angolinian war. By the fury of the terrific cannon fire of both sides, Anna Maria two twenty miles north of the big city of Francis Atlanta was almost literally wiped out from the face of the earth, the suddenness of the flood of shell explosions which created the havoc, precluding the escape of any one unfortunate to be in the town at the time. Unlike the awful catastrophes at Vivian Wickley, the horrors of the disaster at Anna Maria poured upon the devoted Christians and the inhabitants in a moment without the slight warning whatever and the awful slaughter was over within the space of a very few hours. The majority of the victims were killed in the wreckage of their houses or dashed to pieces by the force of terrific explosions before they had hardly time to realize the horror of it all.

A Vivian Wickley the unfortunate people under fire for over eighteen months before Concentinian Aronburgs arrival knew for days, and months before Concentinian Aronburgs armies captured portions of the city, and the relentless storm of rebel artillery fire tore the business and other buildings and residences to pieces what their fate indeed was to be. For nearly two years, facing cruelty from their captors in the city, and from the fury of the siege seige and scantily clothed, with all their possessions taken from them by the enemy, and their children murdered or slaved or hidden they looked death squarely in the face hour by hour, day by day and month after month suffering all the horrors and terrors dire or taint could inflict, their knowledge that they were absolutely powerless and beyond reach of aid despite the besieging armies being so near adding to their agonies.

Death was indeed merciful to the poor people of the war battered Anna Maria, he was unusually cruel to his prey at Vivian Wickley, and delighted in the tortures he was enabled to impose before he placed his hand upon them and bade them come. Perhaps the only parallel in the story to the Vivian Wickley visitation was the destruction to be stated later on in the story of many cities by the great Lucille Nielsen explosion during the battle of Aronburgs gun or glorianna in miles north of Dorothy Gale and near Angolinia Agathia, the frightfullest and bloodiest battle of the entire war so far. Another near as bad was the frightful explosion occurring so long ago at Jennie Vivian. He frightened soldiers of the Angolinians at that section could see the awful torrent of earth and wreckage bearing down upon them from the very sky as if it had been vomited high into the air from the very bowels of a volcano and thrown out from the mighty maw of its crater, but even then they were mercifully stifled by the tremendous shower of earth and dirt which immediately enveloped the scores of thousands and completely covered their works. They did not stand for hours and hours, with the blackness of night and day horrors around them, listening to the roar of the war as an explosion, and hear their death knell sounded long before they were compelled to undergo the actual pain of an awful death, they were caught by the torrent as they sought safety in precipitate flight from their works, and stricken down while desperately endeavoring to get beyond the reach of the sickle of the grim reaper; they all could move and act in accordance with their impulses which prompted the hundreds of thousands of soldiers to make a flight for life and scores of thousands of them succumbed only after a desperate struggle. It was different at Vivian Wickley. The men women and children were the only sufferers, and during the whole seige were not permitted even the small but precious boon of falling while battling with the grim awful reaper; they were caught and imprisoned in their homes and jails of the city by the army even as those who were doomed to death in the Norma Reign of terror, where it might be said, compelled to hear the very cries of horror upon which they were to be hurled. Never in the world for real there is no record not even at Galveston during the hurricane there since time began of such a horrible long drawn out agony as that to which the devoted inhabitants of Vivian Wickley endured during the long eighteen months or nearly twenty months intervening between the advent of a Concentinian Aronburgs advance on Vivian Wickley, and the final imposition of the death penalty during the horrible battles and worse cannonades of the seige. By the time the enemy were cannonading the city to force the victorious Nationals out of Norma Catherine and Julio Gallio, fathers by thousands saw their wives and dear babes and children crushed by the wreckage flung aloft by exploding shells, and hurled around by the fury of every one, or disem bowled in their very arms by fragments of grapeshot and injured themselves, wives saw their husbands and children torn from them by range infuriated Glandiolians, and swept from their sight forever, their torn and gutted bodies hurled in the street and left to rot, children saw their parents disappear in the murky turbid waters of floods, or killed by shells and grapeshot or by musket balls. Men count less in numbers among the soldiers saw even the dead faces of their own loved ones in Vivian Wickley they would have deemed it a joy to save and whom they fought to rescue. The soldiers invited terrible destruction in their desperate efforts at rescue, only to realize how weak and utterly futile was the strength in comparison to the irresistible power of the horrible shell fire. Soldiers during battle died depending because they could not save those they had cherished and left home to fight for and whom they had cherished and heretofore protected, and went down in despair and gloom.

No wonder general Concentinian Aronburg said to his generals during a meeting, and with a half silly loom looking but grim smile;

"It is really better to my opinion that the Glandiolians at Vivian Wickley fight to the last like true heroes, or escape my open jaws, for the whole army no matter how large it is with all their generals and commanders will never receive quarter from me for what they have caused here."

Indeed what happened on 2 September the twenty fifth was the first if not the most horrible battle of the siege on record. A final but futile assault of nearly one quarter of concentinian Aronburg's army was made against the entire line of the Thumbelina and Gertrude Angelina fortifications. The attacks had come with the rush and seemingly the speed of a human avalanche, but half of the assaulting army was crushed and the assault withdrawn. General Gons and Frank Hagh were killed on the glandelinian side however and their losses were more dreadful. Many thousands of glandelinians in the twinkling of an eye by terrific shell fire of the christian batteries which covered the assault were borne from the sunshine of life to the gloom of the valley of the shadow, it was all over in an instant. The bravest of the glandelinians simply waited for the inevitable they clung to their works and fought with a fury as if they desired to die a million deaths before they would let the Angelinians claim them, they stood upon the brink of eternity and fought and screamed and yelled and howled like lost souls. When the main force of these assaults fairly leaped upon the outer works of battered Thumbelina the Glandelinians who were driven from their outer works and rifle pits rushed to their highest places and saw the roaring yelling flood of purple coats creep nearer and nearer through the wall of smoke, until at times it seemed as if the assault would at last overcome them. Although it was not until the darkness of the night ended the horrible conflict and that the Angelinians had been repulsed with horrid loss the generals of the garrisons of the fortifications had known in the afternoon that Vivian Mickey sooner or later was doomed to fall. The Angelinians were fighting too desperately and too wildly to be beaten now they would not under any conditions permit the city to escape capture but had severed all communications with the mainland and elsewhere to prevent aid reaching the city from Manley's armies, and then laughed at the puny efforts of the desperate Angelinian rebels to preserve their lines from destruction.

In this terrible battle in that one day raging along a line of ten miles the death and wounded list was about eight million Angelinians, at Thumbelina alone the known numbers of slain Glandelinians was a score less than two million three hundred thousand. Many soldiers of both sides died in the attack and defense of fortress Gertrude Angelina of whom nothing was ever heard of, and there were possibly 22,500,000 Angelinians who made the assault and anguished the outer works for a while like a seething hell torrent, but the same time the probabilities were that 30,000,000 Glandelinians may have been killed and wounded in the defense of these two lines of such high redan works. No bodies were allowed to be burned or buried for days after the battle, how many were burned upon the many funeral pyres no accurate record was kept. In one respect the two big assaults were alike, but the losses were not so great this time at Thumbelina as it was at the struggle near Gertrude Angelina during those fearful four hours as those occasioned by the fearful beatings of the assaults which for all day almost had the Glandelinians in the outer works at their actual mercy. Fortress Gertrude Angelina was held by a garrison of 30,000,000 Gimmermannians, Mole Hollentinkians and Urmeramians, teeming with cannons and all the makes of terrible works. When the battle began the assault came with without even the slightest warning shout to apprise the troops of the fortress and the flood of troops sweeping upon the outer works almost engulfed and caused the capture of the works and a portion of its defenders before they even knew of the danger. The Glandelinians here were so suddenly taken by surprise that early morning that hundreds of thousands of Glandelinian soldiers literally fought at their guns in their nightshirts. The whole region was a mass of debris and wreckage of wagons, wheels, cannons and trees, and dead when the fearful battle that even wrecked the beauty of nature subsided. Fortress Thumbelina was so had a garrison of forty million, and had within its confines even thousands of stern strangers. But that same day fortress Gertrude Angelina and Thumbelina were not alone in their misery. In the southwest a battle tragedy was enacted simultaneously which claimed scores of millions of victims. A terrific christian assault led by many generals, immeasurable in its fury and force, blotted out a section of the Glandelinian works near Federal the lower section of Vivian Mickey, late in the afternoon of the same day. Nearly 10,000,000 lives were sacrificed, and by the battle for the Glandelinians so scores of millions of dollars worth of military property such as all the tents of their camps, big wagon trains and ammunition stores were sacrificed.

This simultaneous catastrophe was the greatest disaster of its kind to the Glandelinians. The fury of the onslaught caused the destruction of dozens of the most splendid Glandelinian divisions, hundreds of generals and other commanders were killed or wounded, and a great explosion which occurred with the blowing up of an ammunition dump many massive structures in Angelina Aronburg Aronburg was leveled to the ground by the concussion. Big explosions tossed locomotives about, and destroyed long lines of cars which the Glandelinians used as breastworks and points of defense and the Angelinians to prevent the Glandelinian armies from occupying into Angelina Aronburg destroyed a good portion of the Avia Aronburg bridge the longest and strongest structure in the world. The results make the region and the place of the Glandelinian garrisons a mourning region for weeks, and caused the evacuation of the place a little, in which the rebels retreated into the other section of Avia Aronburg, and then fighting from street to street receded into Mickeywhirther and strengthened the garrison of her fortifications. Vivian Mickey therefore surpassed any city in Angelina or Calvernia, in the frightful nature of its calamity. Hundreds of thousands of insane people are being cared for, their reason having been completely overthrown by their great sufferings, and loss of homes and dear ones. This was one of the most saddest features of the shocking visitation. These poor creatures, first bereft of home, family, and property by the ruthless insurgents are now now living in legacies of the most stupendous catastrophe the Angelinian world has ever known, and all caused naturally by the Glandelinians. No wonder general concentinian Aronburg would accept no surrender of the enemy and would allow the firing on men bearing flags of truce if they came to ask for surrender.

ACTUAL NO NUMBER OF DATHSWILL NEVER BE KNOWN.

THOUSANDS OF THE CORPSES OF THE UNKNOWN AND NAMELESS AGAIN

In the town of Gatal, in western Galvernia on the Gorma Run river, fifty thousand Gandelinnians were killed in battle but the main army broke the siege and drove the besiegers away. Six thousand Gandelinnians perished by the siege and Angelinian attacks during the siege of the little village of Glesia in 1913, and four thousand in the village of Portland in the same year. In the siege of Glandetogn by the Gandelinnians themselves in 1914 upwards of four hundred thousand Gandelinnians died in their futile efforts to capture the town. The loss of life during the recent battles and sieges in the state of Angelina vive, and near Ozma and the sieges of Angelinia Agathia and Corothy Gate among the enemy have never been fully reckoned or reckoned, and though one hundred thousand Gandelinnians were said to have perished in the sieges of Francis Atlanta and the battles, and river inundations caused by explosions, the figures were not regarded as trustworthy. These were the only series of great sieges on record where the loss of human life has been estimated at over one hundred thousand per siege. The list of smaller similar sieges and disasters are almost an endless one.

in volume five, where the heavy storm of so many Angelinian attacks finally caused the Glandelinian armies to surrender with the escape of general Beppo Evans army - only. In that siege alone over 10,000,000 kill Glandelinians were killed in the horrible battles, vast Glandelinian armies were overwhelmed, some perished, while over one hundred million were captured in and around Betsy Gobbin, near Porotby Gale, Trot and Zeaniar. This siege told in long narrative of the chapters in volume five was the most frightful siege on record in the whole region of Angelinia, Gathia. The Angelinians at the epic-Holsteinian fortifications and the Dolarsine

Since the beginning of the war Crowley run was frequently besieged by the Angelinians. The besieged districts comprised an enormous area, and the river harv harbor of the city was destroyed. An awful siege occurred early in the war at Jemie Urner on April the ninth the next year after Gen Concanthinian Aronburg had drove Manleys army from it. In this siege numerous lives were lost, and Jemie Urner recaptured by the glandelinians, and the records state, that forty four thousand houses were destroyed by the bombardment, and 10,000 he ad of cattle were captured by the enemy. A large part of the city of Adorn was captured during its siege in 1912, and one million three hundred thousand glandelinians gave their lives to effect it this ends. The citizens of this town fled after having sustained an incalculable lossto property. The same city was again besieged by the Angelinians two months later, and more enormous damage suffered before it was wrested by from the glandelinians and the rebel army compelled to surrender.

the flood itself had been very disastrous but that was practically all that could be said. In the latter part of the siege occurred one of the worst battles ever fought on Angelinian soil at that time. By the bombardment of shell ten thousand houses were damaged, sixty thousand houses were swept away by fire, and more floods and 100,000 people all non-combatants perished in Angeline alone, while equal or perhaps greater calamity was produced among the besiegers who were struck in time by a rousing Christian army which captured the whole army of rebel besiegers and slaughtered it without giving no quarter. In this siege the dwellings of one million persons were laid under water from the bursted dam. During the siege of November in September 1914 two thousand non-combatants perished under shell fire of the ruthless enemy, the own of Lester De Pester suffered to an enormous extent from a siege, and at the time time a flood was made by the glandelinian who dammed up the beautiful river of Glorin which loosened waters swept away forty two small villages, and a large number of their inhabit inhabitants perished. On this occasion an Angelinian corps of over two million men who were encamped on the lower shores of the dammed up river were surprised by the sudden flood and met instant death to a man. A siege catastrophe which in some respects could bring to mind that at civilian key occurred at Calverline (Angelinian) nine teen or more miles north of poverty Gale. The tow big city was overwhelmed by the glandelinian after a one years siege right under the nose of Angelinian Agathia and captured and the siege resulted in an explosion of great violence that by shock and confusion occasion caused the sudden bursting of a gigantic reservoir, and upwards of hundreds of thousands of people were destroyed and many villages swept away. After this the enemy held Calverline in Angelinian for nearly a year.

Many portions of Galvernia had on numerous occasions suffered severely from floods caused by the oncoming levees and dykes of rivers have been broken or blown up and the released waters pouring through and over the lowlands causing great loss of life and damage to property. The levee of the Mississippi River near Galvernia (Galvernia) was washed out by a major explosion and the released waters flooded the center and a southwest of Galvernia to an extent of one hundred miles.

and while the people succeeded in escaping to a great extent, and armies also damaged aggregating over two hundred million dollars were sustained. At the same time of that disastrous year of 1913 a large section of Northwestern Galverinia suffered the inundation of fifty cities and the destruction and sweeping away of a hundred villages and towns by the bursting of six levees of the Erimine river by rebel engineers in the effort to prevent the advance of the armies under the two civilian rulers. So sudden and disastrous was the flood that the advancing armies and even inhabitants of the cities and villages were taken unawares, and the loss of life was never estimated though general Hanson's army lost seven million soldiers in the flood. Another awful inundation occurred in Angolinia sixty miles south of Angolinia Agathia on October 1914. The Gloria Dam was blown open by enemy engineers and the flood covered one hundred thousand acres. The city of Porothy Gale was reached by the flood, in which most of the outer sections of the mobilization camps were swept away, the town of Lyonix sixty miles south of her was almost entirely submerged, in Phelan a big city one hundred thousand houses were swept away, two hundred and eighteen houses were carried away at Gullis, and upward of three hundred thousand at Sandersbury, and other places. It was the greatest and most destructive flood in Angolinia and no longer overflowing its banks on account of excessive rains even anticipated such a flood. At the same time an explosion destroyed sixteen Angolinian batteries of cannons, and sent a torrent of dirt, wreckage, human bones, and everything from the baseline lines like a descending waterfall into the city killing and injuring many more thousands and demolishing all the houses. Everything else seemed to have exploded a great was the destruction and hundreds of thousands of Angolinians were buried beneath the wreckage of earth and gravel and the like. Very few of the bodies of the dead were recovered. The siege was won by this accident for the besieged was annihilated, though much destruction was committed within the baseline line. The explosion due to the ground a mile wide and two hundred feet deep. A hundred thousand lives were lost in the battle and siege of Murenda Junction in Galverinia near the coast, in which the Angolinians were victorious.

The southernmost line of Angolinia had been the scene of numerous sieges. One siege caused a deluge of floods to overwhelm the fertile districts of Glandorn, killing scores of thousands of the besieged Glandelinians and plunging the survivors in such dismay that the siege was hastily abandoned. From famine and pestilence followed, carrying thousands of Glandelinians like cattle. Even Abyedukillo has not been exempt from devastation of floods and battles, and sieges. On December 25, and 26th 1914 the little town of Gure suffered from the effects of a siege of Glandelinian warships and Glandelinian troops and though successfully beating the besiegers sustained a great loss. There have been innumerable small sieges. The country of Glandelinia along all shores had a long list of hundreds of sieges. Glandelinia's city itself was besieged for two months but was not captured. This occurred in the invasion. In the month of January 1914 three thousand non-combatants were killed or injured as the result of the siege of Andehire Galverinia from the same cause. Four hundred families were destroyed in Andehire by a great siege of Glandelinians. The coast of Eastern Galverinia was similarly afflicted. While the record as given above is by no means complete it will serve for all purposes of comparison. It embraces all the most important disasters of the war on record, and shows what a destructive force the armies of both sides have proven to have when aroused.

On September came the most terrific battle in of the entire siege breaking out in the afternoon at 12:45 p.m. the immense lines of fortifications near the section of Glandorn which was called Andean seemed to break down because of the incessant weeks bombardment by the main Christian artillery and at one o'clock in the afternoon the dam holding the main Angolinian forces fairly broke, and a terrible flood of Angolinians extending for forty miles rushed forward furiously against the enemy's positions there toward Lucille Jackson's fortress proper, two and a half miles directly to the southwest, but the fifteen miles by way of the winding river of Glandorn, and within a few minutes part of the works of the enemy were carried and in that terrific onrush within a few minutes nearly two million three hundred thousand soldiers among the Angolinian columns were literally slain (this many it may be known perished) although it may be probable that the loss of life was much greater were lying dead in the works or outside, millions of dollars worth of property were destroyed by the Angolinian cannon, and half of the line of Glandelinian works and a portion of the fortress carried or captured—all because the Glandelinian generals who controlled the garrison were too pernickish to have this section of the line strengthened like Thumbelina and Gertrude Angeline. After this the coroners' verdict was to the effect that general Purragatorian himself was to blame for the disaster. Thousands of barracks in the works or beyond were destroyed, and less than a score of the main fortifications themselves were uninjured by the terrible artillery fire, complete paralysis among the Glandelinian garrisons followed, the whole line of works were abandoned and scores of thousands of Glandelinians were crazed by their wounds and their sufferings and never regained their reason, more Angolinians came up and swarmed up toward the main line of the Lucille Jackson fortifications and pressed on desperately to the assault until the arrival of several Glandelinian divisions put an end to the carnival of carnage, the millions of wounded were withdrawn into the city and cared for until they could get upon their feet again, relief poured in from every section of Glandorn which was not captured by the Angolinians in the shape of hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians and thousands of carloads of supplies of all sorts, the Glandelinian generals picked up courage and went to work driving their big columns against the Angolinians in fierce counter charges and when the apathy succeeding this battle seemed to wear off the works were again in the hands of the daring enemy and the whole assaulting Christian column annihilated and their generals and survivors captured with every regimental flag. The enemy pressed their counter assault clear up to the main Christian line of baseline works, and carried that after one desperate dash, and it took four days horrible fighting day and night with cannons and musketry and many charges for even overwhelming forces of Angolinians to regain their works, and at dreadful loss of life.

At the same time that this horrible struggle ensued another one raged for the possession of the section of Glandorn which was called Mic-whirther. The general of the garrison defender thus fortresses at Mic-whirther had been warned of the impending attack but not a general in command of the outer works knew that the Angolinians under general Johnston had started forward until the flood of troops swept the Glandelinians from their rifle pits, and carried all before it. Escape from the torrent of Angolinians was impossible hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians were surrounded and captured other thousands surrounded, and general Purragatorian hastily made efforts to send reinforcements to the point as quickly as possible and by doing so saved the main work from being captured four miles below these main works was the redoubt and earthworks held by general Scott Gouthorne, which contained a division of two million Glandelinians. The division has not been heard from, but it was said in reports that during the attack four fifths of the Angolinian columns had been swept away to their deaths. Still four miles further down near the bend of the Glandorn river which runs parallel with the Mic-whirther and Pandora Railroad was the works held by general Jackson's division of Glandelinians. It had a force of eight million Glandelinians, ninety per cent of the rifle pits being on a long flat and close to the river. Here the contest was extremely fierce, but the Glandelinians were hemmed in and forced to surrender after their general command was killed. A hundred thousand Angolinians were slain.

Six miles further down where the assault moved in the form of a fish hook, was the main work of the north branch of Thumbelina and here alone there was a topographical possibility of the spreading of the assaulting waves and the breaking of the force of the assault. It contained a force of two million five hundred Mic-whirtherians, and the fire of their musketry, and cannon supported by Thumbelina and Gertrude Angeline tore the assaulting Christian columns to nothing drove back the survivors in hopeless panic and caused their captured capture when the Glandelinians counter charged, and the whole wooded region was fearfully devastated by the firing of both sides. Six million Angolinians were captured by the victorious garrison of fortress Gertrude Angeline.

General Woodvale who was killed early in this desperate battle with the destruction of two million of his four million men was repulsed one mile further down where general Mic-Hollister joined our glandelinian forces and its cluster of sister works, held by general Sebastian Scoodlers with a total of 30,000,000 glandelinians. In front of their works and stretching along right at the river verge were the immense abatis made of iron and steel and which had cost the glandelinians to use fifty five million dollars worth of steel and iron. The greatest damage to general Mic-Hollister's positions and his forces was due to the apparently rebound of the flood of assault as it swept across. The wave of assault spreading out against the north end of the fortifications of Mic-Hollister passed over the Glandelinian rifle pits leaving piles of their dead to a width of thirty yards in some places. It was also believed that the works at Angeline Creek had been carried, and the rush of the Angelinian tidal wave down that way, coming in contact with the spreading wave of Angelinians increased the extent of the violence of the assault in this section. General Kernaville who commanded the glandelinians called the Horners and Hoppers whose positions were across the river had the opinion that so many works would have not been lost to general Furgatorian, and would not have cost so many lives to retake them, had the glandelinians not believed from their experiences with former assaults of Mensians armies that there was positively no danger beyond the carrying of small outer works far in advance of the line. After rushing over the main works at many sections the pressure of the assault was so great that the Angelinians managed to force their way against the main line, and finally the assault struck general Kernaville's Horners and Hopper Glandelinians, spreading all the way up to the main Scoodler line, and then the conflict with the dogged resistance of the Horners and Hoppers aided by the Scoodlers and Glandelinians became most terrific. The assault however was stayed but not repulsed and the battle soon went on with redoubled fury, the Angelinians having now cut off all communication by rail and wire. The terrible holocaust at the Horners and Hoppers works where hundreds of thousands of thousands of glandelinians who were wounded and saved by from death by repulsing the Angelinians were killed by the terrible shell fire of the Christians who used the guns of the other captured works and the loss of life became terrible. It was an inferno of horror not a battle, and general Kernaville had to exert all his efforts to keep the insanely attacking Angelinians back to their respective distance.

On the day after this terrific contest there came to the main Glandelinian general Furgatorian an officer who had scarcely more than a dozen rags to cover his nakedness having his cloth torn in his desperate fighting with the Angelinians.

His name was Hobart Bowman and he was a sort of officer of the guard. By almost superhuman efforts that awful day he succeeded in working his way through the inferno with his regiment and across the body strewn works in the face of a most galling fire, in order to ascertain for himself the terrible results of the deluge of humanity, which he saw start from the main Christian works against the glandelinian works at Andrea and Mic-Whirther and the others in general. He had repeatedly, he declared called the attention to the many main Glandelinian generals to the various weak points in the outer main works of the fortifications of Thumbelina but he continually had received the stereotyped reply that the whole line of works were all right, that they had been built to stand for centuries and to hold out against the world, and that such a thing as its garrisons giving way before the Federal assaults was among the impossibilities. But the young officer did not hesitate to continue his warnings. Finally he was instructed to "shut up" or he would be "put in the hoosegow." He was given to understand that the general of the north section of Thumbelina was tired of all his croakings and that the less he said about the strength of the works from thence on the better it would be for him. The young officer then laid his plans before general Furgatorian the main commander of Vivian Wickey not more than a week before the catastrophe was a catastrophe. He told him that the main efforts of the Angelinians to force the other sections of the city were soon due, and that by the size of the besieging armies, if these assaults should be very heavy, the works would be carried and the army surely forced to give way. The young officer said that general Furgatorian promised to send engineers and child slaves and the like to work on the positions and the redans and if necessary to strengthen the garrison. But somehow the workers and child slaves were not chosen, the garrison was not strengthened as it should have been, and the calamity ensued.

For three days previous to the final outburst, the young officer said, large forces of Angelinians were moving through the wooded sections and advancing near Thumbelina and the north branch of the Lucille Rickson Fortifications and that some columns had forced themselves through the woods but under cover, so that the region seemed alive as if with millions of purple fern stems. The size of the column was so great that one of these columns extended for fully thirty miles horizontally from one end to the other. All this time too the cannonading of the works and positions of the Angelinians, particularly five of the main batteries hurled a shower of shells more resembling a torrent of destruction than a mere bombardment, and the ammunition barrages were supplying the cannonading guns with quite three million rounds per day. At eleven o'clock on the last day of September the young officer said he was attending to a Glandelinian signal corps station about a mile back of the works, when he noticed that the immense columns of Angelinians seemed to be moving forward like a tidal wave. He doubted his eyes, and made a mark on the spot where he had previously seen them gathering and then found that his suspicions were undoubtedly well founded. He ran across the works to the main signal station for better observation and there he saw the main forces of the Christian armies welling forward from their hidden positions and come rushing forward with irresistible force against the main line of Glandelinian works at Mic-Whirther. The sudden uproar of the battle almost dazed him, the whole scene became smoke clogged. Absolutely helpless for a moment he was compelled to stand there and watch the gradual development of what was to be the most bloodiest and disastrous battle of the awful siege. According to his reckoning it took about quarter to one, when the garrisons of a portion of the works began to recoil because of the pressure of the Federal assault, and within eighteen minutes a gap of one mile was made in the main line of defenders at Lucille Rickson fortification, through which the Angelinian columns poured as though forced by machinery of stupendous power. By one o'clock the sagging defending line in gray which before had pertaken somewhat of the form of an arch, fell back under cover of artillery, then the remainder of the line in the outer works recoiled like the opening of twin gates, and the great column of attackers was rushing and yelling forward toward the main line of works and upon the line of Horners and Hoppers which held them finally in check. The young lieutenant became so awe struck at the catastrophe that he was unable to leave the spot until the assault had extended so far that an inferno was before him for the extent as far as his eyes could see how long a time elapsed he did not know before he recovered sufficient power of observation to notice this, but he did not know more than three hours passed. He said he finally went with his own division to help repel the assault and did so. He said however that the main line of works had been carried by the Angelinians and was never finally retaken and had the outer works been repaired after the first disastrous assaults, the awful disaster would not have occurred. Had the works been given just ordinary attention the probabilities are millions of lives would not have been lost anew, and over forty million Glandelinians would not have been captured or forced to surrender. The to have put the outer works into excellent condition to resist any assault would not have cost the army less than $10,000. All was over in a few hours time. The flood of attacking Angelinian troops on the centre of the battle, line rushed over the works they had captured, like a flood of water released from a dam, the shell fire from the desperate Glandelinian gunners, sweeping earth, trees, houses, works and human beings before it like a destructive cyclone, but though the main works seemed to form an impassable barrier to the assaulting Christian columns, the flood of Christian troops passed over and rushed on to wreak fresh vengeance on the Glandelinians further on. One of the most terrible sights of the battle was the main line of works just six hundred yards in front of the Thumbelina fortifications. This line of works was formed of debris of all kinds welded into an almost solid mass by the Glandelinians when they wished to construct new works. In the rear of this were the charred barracks of the Glandelinian defenders and their burned city of tents and the charred and battle mutilated remains of human beings of both sides. The battle at this point followed by fire was one of the incidents of the Vivian Wickey disaster that appalled the world. The story of this horror cannot be fully told. The survivors of both sides if it could not look at the scene without a shock to his sensibilities. So tangled and unyielding was this mass of abatis that even the most terrific shell fire from the captured works had little effect upon it. One most deplorable effect however was to dismember parts of human bodies killed or torn about the mass that the ruth less shell fire refused to leave whole. From the western end of the works the view was but a prologue to the views that were to follow. Looking across the frightful sanguinary battlefield the first object the eye would catch in the ruined fortress of Marcucian, was one solitary unburned or unharmed rebel barracks, standing as a guardian over the dead and scene of desolation—a solitary grim sentinel left on that awful field after the battle. Still further on and near the centre of the captured position were the main encampments of general Granders divisions. Beyond and around these camps and positions were long lines of high walled up sandbags. On account of the shell fire not a sight of these remains. When the great storming assault came, the action of the extensive line of christian batteries was a great source of uneasiness to the glandelinians, and early in the morning the generals were warned that the works were too weak at this point to resist an overwhelming assault, but they had heard the same kind of warnings too often, and many jeered at their informants. Some of those generals that jeered were before nightfall lying cold in death, or met their fate in the blazing storm of grape and canister as they led their troops in the desperate efforts to retake the lost ground, or met their destruction in the blazing piles of foliage set on fire by the discharge of musketry and cannon. Only a few generals happened to head the warning, and these withdrew their armies to the much stronger positions, where they were able to repel the assault and secure the divisions thus driven back.

At the point where the enemy had annihilated the christian forces attacking Fort Gertrude Angeline and then pressed on to assail the main christian line the battle was most terrific and one of the most sanguinary of the war. Early after the annihilation or capture of the christian troops driven back the glandelinians swept through the fields under heavy fire from general granders batteries. Every lane seemed fairly choked with the advancing troops in prayer. At three o'clock the resistless flood of glandelinians coming on unchecked swept away the christian troops defending the defensive lower seige works. This was the real beginning of the main and greatest horror of the battle. The enormous mass of rebel troops moved forward like a log jam hurled upon a town by the force of water. The two lines of outer christian works were carried, half of their defenders were obliterated, and the whole region beyond norma gun, to gumbeek creek, was a raging sea of carnage. The terrible cannon fire along the christian line thus engaged leveled everything before it, but the assaulting columns came on, crushing back the christian defenders of the first line of main works like framehouses, and going on unchecked until the entire main line of christian positions were reached. Had the glandelinian forces not been able to even pass over the main entire line of works at this point the strongest of the seige line the christian armies might have been spared much of the ensuing horror that came. All along the line of glandelinian advance for ten miles there were already dead and dying too many to be counted and many christian columns with dreadful losses had already been swept away in flying panic to the rear, but the dead but could be counted by the fields full and not by seas. The main column was therefore struck, the seeming cannon here and the long lines of high positions forming an impenetrable barrier. The retreating Angelinians had recoiled behind these strong works and hoped by their defiant attitude and by the screaming roar of so many Angelinian cannon that the glandelinians might be come scared and the awful counter assault subside. There was no longer a chance to retreat, for to do so would cause a serious break in the main line and the breaching of the seige and yet had they known what was in store for them the contemplation of their fate would have been enough to make all the soldiers stark mad. Only a few hours had elapsed from the time of the carrying of the first line of works, and the breaking of a section of the main christian line, when the glandelinian columns like a long tidal wave of humanity rushed forward with the most tremendous fury yelling like a hundred million demons. It was as awful and the generals realized what was coming. The shock came like a shattering tidal wave and the immense body of glandelinians seemed like a torrent of water filled with humanity let loose to begin its work of terrible destruction.

The towering wall of glandelinians once swooped onward and struck a portion of the main line of works with such force as to carry all before it. Had it been able to pass the main juncture of the works near the Mac-Hollister and Evangelina St. Clara railroad lines, the Angelinian works might not have been saved from capture. The rampart of logs, battlements, machij-machinery, sand bags, mounds of snow banks, still smelting, granthills of stones, barriers of teeming cannon and long infantry lines supported by gathling guns of all describable description however checked the torrent of humanity by tearing half of it away with their annihilating fire, and though the torn up line swung like a half sw wheel and strong the right of the works it was swept away with terrible destruction.

This destruction however only inspired the main line of assault, and as there had to be an outlet for their retreat somewhere as the Angelinians counter charged in a manner to cut off the remainder of the glandelinian surge, the glandelinians made a new and trebled attack and cut their way through the very heart of the christian position driving back those among the Angelinians who had counter charged them again and again did the succeeding glandelinian waves hurl them selves against the christian positions, and each wave received a fire that tore it to fragments. The main section of the christian line supported by reinforcements and receiving fresh cannons and more ammunition stood as firm as a rock, but for a time the left line of works was carried the Angelinians there attacked by overwhelming numbers giving way, and some fifty million Angelinians on a line of battle ten miles long were carried away into a torrent of panic stricken horde and intermingled with the glandelinians who fought like demons to kill and capture as many Angelinians as possible. This is a new outlet the glandelinian currents were diverted in the direction of the Cambria batteries held by the Winkie Abyssinklians and punchkins, and undlings, and in a moment all these batteries opened with an ear splitting roar that shook the air and half of the victorious glandelinian columns reaching that far were engulfed in the destruction of their ranks that followed and laid low. Here also had gathered an immense force of undling and punchkin infantry under general Henry Dorner, and almost before the corner glandelinians who survived realized it or their peril the whole red line of christian troops rushed forward in a roaring screaming counter charge and the glandelinians though fighting like mad were swept away before that so seething human red torrent. It was now as awful and the most desperate hand to hand fighting while retreating added to the terror of the situation. Finally the whole section of what was left of the glandelinian recoiled before that horrible slaughter and as they gave way the Angelinian forces followed and carried all before them. It was now night, and darkness added to the terror of the horrible battle. When came flames to make the cal calamity all the more appalling. Hundreds of barracks belonging to the encampments of the christian line were on fire. The wooden barricades of the works were blazing, the and the inmates being mostly wounded had little time to escape. And as just how many wounded soldiers were imprisoned in the mass of wreckage caused by the attack and cannon fire of the enemy may never be known but the number was estimated at between one million and two million Angelinians. Even the foliage in the front of the works, the wreckage of the positions and everything from the effects of such flashes of guns had burst suddenly into flame and all tun tongues of fire began to leap up in a long line of conflagrations. The firing of many cannons and musketry, and the explosions of grape and canister and shell had set fire to the wooden portions of the long line of works, and barracks, and the scene that was then witnessed was beyond description. Millions of shrieks, and prayers from the unhappy sea of wounded in the path of the flames or in the buildings pierced the air, but at first little could be done. Soldiers, officers and privates alike, lying helpless on the battle field in the thick foliage watched with indescribable agony the flames creep slowly toward them until the heat scorched their faces, and they were slowly roasted to death. Those who were held fast in the timbers of the shell wrecked barracks by an arm or a leg begged their rescuers piteously that the imprisoned limb be cut off. Many however succeeded in getting loose with mangled limbs, and scores of hundreds of men cut off their very arms that they might get away.

Hundreds of thousands of Angolan soldiers not wounded in the battle worked like demons to save the sea of unfortunate wounded from the fast approaching flames of the conflagration, but scores of thousands were burned to death.

Meanwhile the glandelinian columns under general pic-hollaster johnston or at least his right wing had been wiped out, general gambrian positions were captured and his glandelinian army swept away and general gonemoughers army was now a thing of the past. The glandelinian brigade of general Miller yiller which was once over a million strong strong had nothing left of it now but a few remnants of one thousand men. General Woodvales division had been captured by the victorious Angolians and general orbers army was wrecked. Hundreds of thousands of glandelinians were killed in their own works, many columns of glandelinians were swept away from their bravely defended works, and many of the fugitives met death or capture, hundreds of men were burned by the fire that later overtook them, and hundreds of thousands of retreating glandelinians who sought safety in their still stronger works were overwhelmed by the attacking christian forces, or blown to their deaths by the wild explosions of a many bomb and shrapnell shells. The instances of the greatest heroism and self sacrifice were never excelled, perhaps not even equalled, on any other battlefield. Men rather than save themselves alone died nobly by their standard, and flag bearers willingly gave up their lives rather than let the flag be captured by Angolians. On one occasion it took twenty armed Angolians to capture the flag of a single glandelinian flag bearer.

During the great counter attack which broke against the main christian line after the massacre and dispersal of the Angolan forces that again assailed Fortress Gertrude Angeline there were great acts of bravery within the christian camps. At three o'clock in the afternoon, said general tender gander of the Angolan engineering corps "some girl scouts were cheerfully signally away at the height of the battle, but she soon had to abandon the task, because the firing approached too near and she was facing shot and hell and grape. She finally declared by signal that she was signalling from another station, and the enemys assault was gaining most steadily. She and her companions were frightened, and said that many works in their sight were overwhelmed by the rebels. This was evidently before the assault reached the main positions, for one of her companions said something to her to encourage her and she was signally signalling back to some other station when the receivers skilled ears of a telegraph army station caught a sound of the wire made by no human hand or voice. By the explosion of a shrapnell in the air near the telegraph wires the wires had been severed and had grounded or the signal station had been swept away by the destructive blast, no one knows which now. At three o'clock during the height of the battle the brave girl scouts were there, and fifteen minutes later the men of the other signal stations might as well have asked the grave to answer them.

Colonel Edward check saw during the struggle an old general lying wounded behind the firing lines near a fallen tree with agonized face and streaming gray hair. Regardless of the peril of facing the enemys deadly fire the young colonel plunged into the fray, and after some difficulty brought the old general safely to the rear of the lines. Scarcely had he done so, when a shell burst near general b. gendensions headquarters and general gonemoughers who was directing a long line of men near it fell severely wounded. Check plunged into the dangerous zone again, and while dragging the general beyond danger was struck by a rebel bullet which cut an artery in his right wrist, but though weakened with loss of blood, he succeeded in saving the general from being captured by the glandelinians. A young private, a brave man, saved sixteen wounded officers near Minavon works but got killed attempting to save a general who was wounded. Colonel Bolivar and his three regiments were at this time being forced from their works by the foe. The mass of troops being struck at two places by the foe commenced to part and form a gap and by desperate efforts the Colonel succeeded in getting the regiments to a line of strong works behind a little wood. Just then the van of the assaulting glandelinian wave came up and a terrific assault was made upon the little brigade with redoubled force. The main force of the attack fell upon the centre. The colonel saw at a glance that he could not save his three regiments from capture, and so rather than yield to the enemy he ordered them to fight to the death. A moment later a terrific explosion occurred near the works, and in six moments the three regiments with the colonel were destroyed. Captain Henry Hoppensia, distinguished himself during the battle by his bravery. He was an officer of an pinkie Abyssinilian regiment, which had been forced back from its position to Goodlove hollow. As the regiment passed a point where a line of other works were full of struggling christian and glandelinian soldiers intermingled together in a death struggle, an officer a lieutenant of his command fell near him. A part of the regiment halted to repel the advancing foe, and Capt. Captain Hoppensia, in two trips back through the inferno saved the officer and his colonel. The division of troops stopped at Bolivar fortifications at three thirty o'clock and their generals were notified that further progress for the enemy was impossible because of the deadly fire of the main christian batteries beyond. The greatest excitement prevailed in his region, and parties of soldiers were all the time endeavoring at the risk of their lives to save wounded officers that were in danger of being hurled into eternity by the shell storm of the captured guns in the possession of the enemy. The tidal waves of the glandelinian assault stroke stroke struck against the Bolivar fortifications just after three thirty, and in five minutes the battle arose to a fury that spread to a terrific violence for the length of ten miles in this location. Soon here and there regiments and brigades were recoiling before the enemys assault. The main line of christians further to the rear realizing what was happening gathered in battle array and they were reinforced by the men under Garfield. They brought up their batteries of gathling guns and a torrent of grape and canister was throwing them into the ranks of the enemy, as troops in panic passed by in the efforts to check the fierce rebels. For half an hour all the efforts were fruitless until at last, when the Angolians were about giving up all hope, the rebels began to waver. In this moment Captain Gary Garney rescued a young Angolan drummer boy who had been pursued by glandelinians who were striving to run him through with the bayonet. The explosion of a grapeshot threw some men down, but the others managed to reach him and fought off his enemies until until he was successfully drawn to the rear amid the wild cheers of the others. The drummer boys story of the frightful calamity of assault is as follows:

"With my comrades I was spending the day in the camp in the Gambria works. The battle was going on then but the assault had not reached out part of the line though I have heard of nine christian generals being killed and fourteen wounded. Shortly after three o'clock there was a noise of awful firing, and the screaming devil yell of the enemy. We looked out of our tents and saw a perfect flood of glandelinians running toward camp firing and hooting. My friends at first told me not to mind, as the enemy would get no further because the main christian batteries would check their advance. We soon saw remnants of glandelinians being swept away, but the survivors came on, and we started to run for the rear. The glandelinians were approaching in three long thick lines, as straight as a stick, and every one of us who defended the camp could not withstand that pressure that was choking us out and we had to retreat, though we contested every inch of ground. In my fright I jumped on a cannon caisson. I saw the enemy was keeping on in the advance, and I was afraid I would be overtaken. Gradually the gray line seemed lifted up like a wave. The air grew close and suffocating from the thick smoke of powder and the main column of Angolians was moving back to the rear.

Still onward came the glandelinians, the other section of the christian force yelled and a section of it also gave way. When suddenly I found myself engulfed by a torrent of soldiers in purple, and was forced to follow them. After a little this line of retreating soldiers began to part, and I was afraid the enemy was overtaking us and I was going to be killed or captured, but just then another column of troops came up to stem the rebel tide, and I managed to get behind some rocks and remained there until nearly dead from the excitement, din and exhaustion, when after being pursued by rebels I was saved. After I escaped from the glandelinians, I did not see general Gloria who was in command of the division of whose drummer boy I was. I saw one lieutenant trying to see what was going on and climbed a tree to do so, but he must have been killed by a shrapnell, as shells were exploding fast around him. General Pinter was also wounded. General Pinter in command of a part of the same division, was shot down right in front of his men. General Francis Smith was also killed. Colonel Hanson Hopper who was trying to observe something in a tree top with his field glasses was killed when a gun grapeshot struck down the limb he was sitting on and he had a hundred fifty foot fall. Four other generals were killed. The scene during the retreat was terrible.....In dense columns were pouring past me like a stampede of cattle going with me and away from me. I would hear a shell shriek and scream, and then there would be an explosion among a regiment and I saw many men lying on the ground. All along the line other troops rallying were trying to stem the victorious Glandelinian advance, but they could do nothing, and only a few were saved."

Chapter Twenty-eight an incident

The boys story was but one incident and showed what happened to one Christian division. God alone knew what had happened to hundreds of regiments who were retreating or resisting the advancing Horners and Hopper Glandelinians and the Munchkin Mic-Hollestonians. It was impossible to get anything in the way of warning or signals because many signal stations were under the hottest fire. Awar-correspondent whose name was Darger who was an eye witness told me wrote a story of unparalleled horror which occurred at the Trotter bridge, which crossed the Sunbeam Creek at this point. As the enemy were coming on in a long line and carrying all before them, a young general and two colonels were seen coming at the head of their fleeing troops. At the upper bridge a warning was given to them. This he failed to understand. Between the bridge the general was noticed to point toward the fleeing troops, and the so reaching enemy following close behind. He was then seen trying to rally his command and instruct his officers what to do, when they got their men behind the wall of rocks and trees, which they were seeking shelter from behind. On came the insane foe with a rush. The brave force stood to the new position as if with their arms around the trees and rocks.

As the screeching gray coated fiends reached the new position and swept against it they met a terrific fire that scathed their whole line, but securing some advantageous position they returned as fierce a storm and the trees were torn by bullets and shrapnel of leaves. Seeing that his forces could no hold out against the attacking foe, he ordered a gradual withdrawal, which started toward the rear.

The current of the Glandelinian tide forced the division further on toward the rear. The young general somehow enabled to soon seize a new position, and the force was placed behind it. Here they held out against three assaults like leech hoes. The first assault struck the line, sweeping part of it away in panic. The remainder of the division hung on like a drowning man with his body immersed in water. A overwhelming force of the rebels soon gathered against the force of Christians and fought desperately to drive the Angolinians. When there was a sudden crash, and a section of the bridge was blown up and floated down stream, and the Christian force had no avenue of escape except by water. They waded in water too deep to be reckoned, thousands were drowned or lost in the flight, before the eyes of horrified reinforcements being hastily sent against the foe. Early at the line a general and his two divisions were seen also to pass in disorderly retreat, toward Bolivar works. Reinforcements were sent to their relief and all three were saved from total defeat by general Cokeville's battery which half annihilated the assailant at this quarter.

The most peculiar and sad scene during this battle occurred near general Wienstiens works which also heavily assaulted held however. Not knowing her danger a strange little girl one of the refugees no doubt passed under a bridge in the midst of the awful bomb storm. She was kneeling on the bank of the river and had her hands clasped as if in prayer. Every effort was made by Angolinians to reach her to save her, but as to approach her was certain death their efforts proved futile. An officer who was near by remarked that the piteous appearance of the little waif brought tears to his eyes and he was compelled to order the firing along his lines to cease at any cost to save her. All day long along Wienstiens line the Angolinian soldiers stood to their works and artillery repelling every assault. Parts of houses, furniture of trees and the like were set on fire to prevent the enemy from getting around to the rear. The main force of the assault had evidently spent its force against his lines. During the night guards were unusually thick in number and watchers with searchlights remained along the whole line of mountain position to watch for signs of more assaults until daybreak, when the first view of the awful devastation caused by the battle was witnessed.

When the great waves of Glandelinians swept upon the line of general Horners division the Angolinians who could not hold against the assault, fled in panic and ran hither and thither in every direction. They did not have any definite decision where they were going, only that a host of insane devils in gray uniforms seemingly as many as the fiends in hell was roaring down upon them, over their works, and that they must get out of the way of that. Some in their terror dived into ravines, though this was certain death. Others got up to high rises of ground and strove to rally. But the mass majority made for the rear to the main positions, which resisted the enemy like a hundred million giants. Of the soldiers who retreated toward the main line the Glandelinians captured them. Other Angolinians by great numbers clung to tree tops and roots and windrows of debris, furniture, and other obstructions and again attempted to resist the enemy and temporarily stopped them, and managed to save themselves from capture or destruction. After nightfall when the enemy had recoiled to the works they had captured the defeated Angolinian forces either stayed in their main battered camps or fortified works, all night, or they managed to find shelter behind their strong batteries which were cannonading the enemy all night long. There was that night a fear of scouting parties going back to their rear. Even Angolinian troops whose works the enemy did not as yet reach through some reason or other had abandoned them, and began to think of all of these things, as a siege broken and the whole of Glandelinian Wik Wickey so desperately gained and at such cost lost to them and the enemy totally victorious. The most of the retreating forces had to put up in tents, fortresses, sheds, barns, and in the long camps of barracks and earthworks which had been but partially ruined. They could not not one man sleep that night, and it took the liveliest kind of skirmishing to keep the enemy from making raids and sowing sorrows. They surely were beaten, and beaten disgracefully and they knew it. Six lines of works were in the enemy's possession for the extent of fifty seven miles, a part of the main and last line was also occupied by the Horners and Hoppers and the Glandelinian flag was literally floating over the roof of general Concentinian Aronburg's own headquarters from which he and his generals were driven. It was apparent it was broken siege.

During the night the surviving generals and officers did their best to get the shattered line into better shape. The soldiers were housed as far as possible, in the barracks still standing, and some idea of the wreck of the siege works may be gathered from the fact that three hundred thousand prominent barracks buildings out of one million were undamaged. Concentinian Aronburg and his main generals knowing the extent of the assault, during the night put in fresh columns of troops and prepared without one moment's sleep to plan and make fierce efforts to regain the captured works. For a part of that horrible night many of the soldiers were so dazed and surprised by what had happened that they were scared out of their wits, and for that matter many were still dazed when morning approached and believed it futile to continue the siege of Glandelinian Wik Wickey. Most of the soldiers for a time went about helpless, sleepless, making vague inquiries as to how many of their friends fell in that volcano of war, and hardly feeling the desire to continue fighting. They were discouraged. Finally the realization of what would result if the siege was broken nerve'd them to greater efforts, and something was in store for the enemy on the morrow.

The fatal railroad line as it is now called where the enemy met the greatest resistance in their headlong charge. And where the Christian musketry and artillery fire wrecked such awful destruction, was described by another newspaper reporter in this way:

The Christian fortified works a little to the rear of the Mic-Holleston and Glandelinian St. Clare railroad line, whose resistance of the torrent of rebels, was since the matter of such talk of the nation was a noble four sectioned position, just completely completed by general Mansion before Concentinian Aronburg came to take his place in command. One position was nearly fifty feet wide on top, thirty two feet high above the ground in a slant like a hill of long extent and consisting of a powerful line of abatis, and seven batteries, consisting of two thousand cannon each, besides machine guns and shield guns.

Despite the wild fury of the enemy onslaught and the terrific artillery fire from the enemy guns from the six lines of captured works, the works still remain wholly uninjured, except that it is for its whole length badly splintered on the upper and front sides by the explosions of so many shells, but that it remains so is due solely to the accident of its position beside the railroad tracks, and not to its strength, although it was and still is the embodiment of great solidity.

When the main force of the assault struck it covered by the artillery fire from the other captured works in front, the rebel artillery fire would have swept it away as if it had been built of cardboard leaving no track behind, if it had not been for the fierce artillery fire of the main Christian batteries that prevented it from being done, but fortunately or unfortunately the line of work works was exactly a parallel with the path of the Glandolinian advance, attack, which hence struck the Christian line full with its irresistible force, and compressed the whole of its force of advance in a forty mile advance into one inextricable mass of confused troops battling like demons until reinforcements hurled against the common enemy stayed their advance.

The great abatis that was supposed to have protected the works consisted of every tree that the Angelinians for weeks had been chopping down, with trifling exceptions, including thousands upon thousands of larger trees, all of which were almost stripped of their bark, and a smaller limbs and every leaf almost gone from the tearing storm of grape canister and bullets or shells. All the wrecked wreckage of abandoned houses in many towns abandoned by the refugees at the beginning of the siege many miles long, half the innumerable things of sharp pointed material that could be secured, many hundreds of miles of telegraph and other wiring torn from telegraph poles during the siege and many hundreds of times more than this that was in stock in the captured mills, perhaps two hundred and sixty five miles of tracks and track material, railroad all, broken locomotives, pig iron, brick and stone, broken boilers loaded with explosives attached to batteries or electricity, steam engines, wagons, all kinds of heavy machinery taken from child slave mills, and other spoils of captured works of the enemy. The fact that such a strongly defended works as should be so quickly captured in the face of overwhelming numbers of Angelinians in one crushing charge, and to accumulate the retreating Christians and pursuing rebels into one inextricable mass was beyond understanding. The abatis alone after the terrific battle was covered with hundreds of thousands of Glandolinians, dead, dying, and wounded, who fell in facing the seething Christian fire as they strove to break through the abatis, and some were killed as they were pinioned in it, many caught by the lower part of the body only. Many eye witnesses described the groans, cries and blasphemies which came from that vast holocaust for nearly the whole night, something unbearable to listen to, yet which could not be escaped. Hundreds of thousands, undoubtedly suffered a slow death by fire yet the writer here cannot doubt that the vast majority of the men of that assaulting column of Glandolinians streaming from fortress Gertrude Angeline and Thumbelina in that fearful jam against the Christian line, which covered fully forty miles of advance, and perhaps more were already dead when the recoil to the captured works began.

One offshoot of the Glandolinian torrent or the main assault was deflected southward by the repulse in the assault on general Gaulters works and positions and this rebel column went tearing through the entire Christian camp in that seething section, especially through the heart of the southern section of the Christian line, and still another similar branch of the assaulting wave was split off from the main wave further down, but in the main, the direct force and fury of the assault, did not strike this southern section of the line.

It struck first against the jam of abatis and the main line of works, and thus from the fearful loss lost most of its fierce energy, moving thence onward in a heavy stream of men but were finally checked. Shells from the main Glandolinian battery of the fortifications of Thumbelina and Gertrude Angeline which covered the onslaught in general teemed about the Christian army barracks in the most fantastic kind of wreckage, so that that part of the camp looked much like a child's toy village or city poured out of a box-haphazard, the houses not being torn to pieces generally. About half the loss of life and the enormous number of wounded of both sides was in this section of the battle field, for all of the ten mile width of the besieging Christian camps and works and positions became became so readily a scene of victorious totally victorious Glandolinians, and stayed so all night, and it was here, that all the remains of so many women and injured officers occurred. Nothing of the kind was possible in other sections of the battle line itself as the fury of the conflict was entirely too wild. Like wise after the total breaking of the main Christian line had occurred, and the forces of Christian troops began to recede for the distance of nearly fifty miles, it was from this region chiefly that a many torrents of Angelinians recoiled in utmost panic.

However the existence of this strong line of works, and the severe resistance of the defenders naturally broke the fierce continuity of the diabolical crush of Glandolinians, and with the help of the Winkie Abyssinkilians and their main batteries finally transformed the big Glandolinian wave into a retreating column back to the captured work works. The vast Glandolinian onslaught of the Angelinians was badly wrecked with the loss of hundreds of thousands of lives, but in the main from other sections down to general Henry Dorners divisions, the attack of the enemy being checked at last ceased to be so irresistible or destructive. It took almost every work it came to, for the length of fifty miles of the siege, and captured every other rifle pit and a portion of the main and last works, and did other minor damage to the main Christian line, but the Winkie Abyssinkilians under general Porter saved the besieging army from a serious disaster and a breaking of the siege by finally equalizing the crush of the wave of humanity in gray. Nevertheless it could be termed for that day at least, as the most greatest Glandolinian victory in the war outside of the Gaudinon horror.

General Johnston sparr the Abyssinkilian commander in charge, of the Concentinian divisions on the first section of the captured Christian works, which was caught in the first crush of the flood of advancing Glandolinians, told a thrilling story of his experience. His divisions about three of them had been placed in the outer works of the besieging fortifications on high hilly ground in front of the main line. He saw the big Horns, Porter and Hopper forces coming under general Mic-Holleston Johnston. He saw the fierce porters and Hoppers under Johnston and Purragatorian coming and described it as having the appearance of a sea of yelling men coming toward his lines. He immediately galloped to his lines and ordered his brigades to hold the works to the last or die. General Johnston David Porter with his Winkies and quailings was in possession of an angle of the works held by general Lancaster De Porter. This line of troops was the first struck by the Zhamannians and general Barr, Davis and David Portat were killed at the very start of the wild conflict and their brigades torn to pieces and routed from the works. The survivors were routed for a distance of about two hundred yards, the porters pouring a fierce storm of cannon and musketry into their flying ranks, and the Winkie Artillery being captured the line for a time was perfectly paralyzed. General Glimson Evans who took David Portats place barely managed to rally his own division of Abyssinkilian Hoppers and Osmanians before the roaring seething Glandolinian floods swept upon his line.

His line at once opened with the roar of hell and the whole wave of Glandolinians charging against him were destroyed and the second line grinded with the sound of general Purragatorian who was in the lead. General Mic-Holleston Johnston the main commander, sent forward the rest of his line and it went with crash and roar against the Christian works held by general Sparr and Nervine Nervo the latter Christian general being killed. General Sparr afterwards as he said did not know how many Glandolinians were shot down by cannon and musketry in that fearful charge or how many Angelinians lost their lives who were driven from the ill fated works. The whole division of Winkies which were carried away by the force of the porters and Hoppers pressure had lost all their regimental, Brigade and divisional commanders, and half of their numbers, and all their flags were torn by bullets and grapeshot, and how many regimental standards were captured no body knew. At least twenty flags were torn so badly that they were mere rags. To make it fortunate for the Angelinians or Abyssinkilians the Osmanians and gun hkins alone held their ground against the attack, and their stand served in a measure to protect the main works and prevent the enemy from carrying all before them. General Franklin Gale in command of the Glandolinian gasketers was killed and his own command destroyed by the cannon fire of the Winkie Artillery. Some idea of the terrible force of the Glandolinian assault may be gained from general Sparrs the statement that forty regiments in the right of the works, and brigades thirty seven in number of Winkie Abyssinians and guerrillas swept past his rear line of works in the frightfullest panic, and their bravest officers were not sufficient only enough to rally them. General Amenton of the Angolinians who also resisted the assault had a most wonderful escape. He was caught in the retrograde motion of the Winkie Abyssinians and the fury of exploding cartridges torn tore or burned off his body his entire uniform and he was thrown down and wounded slightly by the concussion of a heavy explosion. The general had declared that while he lay more dead than alive on the works he saw the tidal wave of glandelinians press on absolutely victorious and cut the retreating Winkie and Gun guerrilla line to pieces. The general when rescued from this precarious position was taken in a stretcher to the rear of the lines and provided with a suit of clothes belonging to a refugee and was brought to his headquarters thus arrayed.

Colonel Maloney a Winkie officer in command of the Angolinian forces, had at first thought of ordering his men to retreat when the shock of the attack came and then fearing that if it was done his line of regiments would share the same fate of the Winkie brigades kept his men sticking to their works like leeches. When the first attack subsided with the final withdrawal of the enemy when reinforcements were concentrated against them, a number of men rushed to the works expecting to find Colonel Maloney dead and his three regiments annihilated, but the pressure of the attack had not gone with fury enough to destroy them, and his regiments were all right save for some severe loss. When the attack had been still in full force general Sparr had made an attempt to form a force of troops in his rear to make a counter charge but after ploughing through the enemy's ranks for about thirty yards they were forced to return to a safer position.

The last Christian line to receive the shock of the enemy's big counter charge was the one rolled back to the rear but not in confusion where it made a fierce stand. The victorious glandelinians had forced themselves through seven miles of Christian camps and earthworks, with losses too heavy to be estimated. The last line of works extended from General Conventinian Aronburg's Headquarters to Jennie Vivian. These last works were the last of the all, and in the advance the enemy had never been stopped so often as they were in coming here, and whose left had been cut off and forced to fall back to the work works it had captured.

No reports of the great increase of the concentrated numbers of Angolinian reinforcements had reached the glandelinians during the assault extended up to this point. Being fully confident of success now the glandelinians pressed on in two immense columns upon the centre of the line commanded by wounded Viviananna, and thought they had a fair chance of reaching these last works without any real resistance with out anything else. The original other works had been passed and carried without failure. The advancing rebel columns were about one hundred yards of the line, the retreating troops swarmed behind and collected together with the reinforcements, and the artillery sent a storm of canister and grape in among the advancing ranks of the foe, and their destruction of many glandelinians brought cheers from hundreds of hundreds of thousands who watched the advance of the victorious glandelinians, and for a moment or two forgot the condition of their shattered lines, in the excitement of watching the amphibious prowess of the Horner column.

"We've seen the worse of this term before," said general Vivian-anna to a couple of excited generals grouped near him as the last of the four miles of human billows billowed across the billows here will have to hold out to the left. "We've seen the worse of it, but the works here will have to hold out at all costs or the siege will be broken. When they come near enough we will give em hell."

So the main Angolinian forces stood panting for a while behind their main line of extreme works, while the late afternoon sunlight shone on their uneasy flanks, and the apparently baffled glandelinian wave rolled onward slowly against the lower works driving all before them on their right. The works thus captured already was just teeming enough enough with cannons to give the glandelinians an impetus for another header against the apparently broken Christian line.

It was into the last of the outer works that the rebel column seemed to be heading for this time. It was no longer a question of impatience, it was a question of endurance endurance. The billows of Christian forms swept not in and over the works on the left but upon the broad abatis defended works by the railroad tracks like an overflow of a river flood, to seem to be broken into a thousand chop waves by the fire of musketry, cannon and grape that met them from the defenders of these works. The Angolinians watching the one from the main works forgot to cheer. The generals and officers seeing the enemy press on still victorious despite the formidable works and its abatis forgot to joke about the enemy, and to fret on the part of the privates. It was a curious and ticklish situation. The enemy was advancing more swiftly and wildly. The front lines covered by smoke of their own musketry fire were out of sight. The only sign of an advancing glandelinian flood was an audible one, a cannon pounding and crashing of musketry, and their fierce "Devil yell". The rebel line that became visible a little after and which was much nearer looked to like a broad gray river dragon wriggling on its belly sideways sideways a toward the Christian forces who were not retreating but fighting desperately as they gave way. Gradually there was a simultaneous though not concerted movement among other lines of troops ahead of them. Retreating Angolinians began crowding toward Conventinian Aronburg's headquarters and the positions there, and above the din suddenly was heard a cry from some officer in a voice which has had just the least crescendo of excitement in it.

"If you fools don't keep to your works we can't do anything!" He shouted. This demand was a little absurd. Still it had its uses. It relieved the tension which everybody felt in the main line who watched the distant conflict which everybody felt and no one acknowledged. Joking began again among generals and other officers, and their fretting and works of words of impatience among the privates and courses among the artillery-men. There had not been much fun in looking toward the rebel column anyway. What had appeared to be a recession of waves of humanity in purple toward Aronburg's headquarters when looked at from above was merely a swelling of the stream of defenders elsewhere, by the quick and prompt advance of reinforcements sent by Conventinian Aronburg or Williamberger Zimmermann as he calls himself.

All at once the left wing of the McHollister Johnston which had been moving more swiftly than usual against the retreating Angolinians for each of a good ten minutes stooped short at the sight of the rally and reinforcements concentrated against them. It seemed as if their horned and Hopper generals had scented danger of some sort like a sensitive horse, and refused to advance further. The uproar of firing in that location however grew louder and wilder in sound, and then other columns of Angolinians were seen to leap from hidden rifle pits and to tear their way deep into the glandelinian column and begin driving the horned and Hoppers back step by step. The pandemonium of yelling which arose from those combatants was much more in volume than ever heard before and was deafening. Then came an ear-splitting crash and everything was hidden from sight as all the cannons in the captured works were let loose in full fury upon the Angolinians who again began to give back.

"Reinforcements for the darn rebels," said the same voice who had commanded the retreating troops to a rally.

"So it was. The Angolinians were again forced back by reinforcements. The glandelinians were seen advancing in wide formation and wedge formation over and up to fence rails near the tracks, over plank roads, and dismantled signal stations, platforms along the line, and firing from behind behind railroad ties innumerable in many piles, branches and even small trunks of trees concealed rebels firing from behind them and the Angolinians were again slowly falling back before the ever rising flood of the wicked rebellion. There had been another force of advancing reinforcements in sight just beyond Jennie Vivian Station near Gunbeam Junction, but as sure as guns were iron and floods of attacking glandelinians were floods of insane reckless humanity fighting for a cause that was unjust, the reinforcements were disappearing in a sea of smoke.

"I don't believe the enemy will ever get through." Was the unanimous comment of many officers in command of the main line of works, and their verdict seemed to be confirmed officially by the man who had been excited.

ZA colonel whose regiment was above the danger line on the right bluff above the captured works, and who says he saw the rush of the death storm says that the glandelinian attack was preceded by a peculiar phenomena, which he thinks was the explosion of a mine. He says that a few minutes before the wall of humanity in gray had reached the main line of works from which they were hurled back there was a tremendous explosion some where in the outer works first captured by the enemy. He said he saw the fragments of buildings rise in the air above the rolling mountain of smoke, and these same moment saw two, lines or arches of flame down through the line of works in different directions, and the frame barracks were apparently being torn to pieces and wrecked. The next minute the assault came, and he remembered nothing more than seeing for over an hour a sea of flames and smoke. There was really an explosion of a mine under the captured works exploded purposely by the Angelinian Engineers by means of electric push down batteries, that wrecked the assaulting column just at the time of the last of the assault. Lines of barracks were set on fire by the explosion. General Fredrick he was the one who survived the three other terrible days when the Angelinians fought so desperately to recapture the lost works said his experience was terrible. He said that during the three days when overwhelming forces moved against the enemy through that seething inferno of battle he saw hundreds of columns go forward to meet their death, and the attackers fought as if they actually had become raving maniacs. One work after another was finally recaptured, the firing was like the roaring of a million cannon, and many times whole lines melted away before the works. The enemy finally on the third day were driven from the last line of works after withstanding the first line of christian charge and then recoiled to their own works near Thimabellina. No one will ever know the real horrors of this last three days incident unless he saw the moving columns, go through that seething storm of musketry and cannon and make charge after charge. The horrible nature of the affair cannot be realized by any person who did not witness the scene. As soon as possible after the last crash at the last line of recaptured works occurred and the fourth day of the long battle finally was over, many hurried to the scene. At the time when the works of the last were recaptured the battle was a seething hell. Hundreds of thousands of Winkie Abbeismians, quailings, Manchkins, aided by Angelinians, Pandobians, and concentinians were struggling most desperately with the Glandelinians of all sects. Frantic generals implored their men for God's sake not to give in their assault now, and every man was anxious to outdo the other in bravery during the assault, and while fighting like fiends the glandelinians, raved, cursed, blasphemed until the air appeared to tremble from their awful shouts. No system, no organized efforts to repel the assault however was of any avail to them now.

The glandelinian glandelinian commanders shrieked commands, and entreated to their men and would shout "Go to that place, and drive back those screaming red coated imps, for God's sake get back there to your works you fools referring to some skulkers who were trying to retreat." Under the circumstances it was necessary to do everything to prevent the Glandelinians from moving over and one Angelinian column of men thinking one general was trying to thwart their efforts, when he ordered another point to be attacked by the Winkies, advanced upon him, threatened to shoot him, or dash him in among the raving gray coated demons.

One glandelinian general who was trying his greatest efforts to stem the christian tide, saw his Manchkin Zimmermannians lost lose their hold on their desperately defended works, and in a moment it seemed as if the victorious Winkie Abyssinkilians swept into a sea of flame, and rushed the enemy. The agony of that Glandelinian general in seeing his division cut to pieces and almost annihilated was simply heartrending even though he was a Horner. He raised his arms to heaven with clenched fists and screamed in his blasphemous and mental anguish and only ceased that to tear his hair, and for a moment moan like one distracted, and then place a pistol to the side of his head and kill himself.

Every effort was made in urgent desperation to keep the last line of works by the Horners and Lopper Zimmermannians and every second glandelinian who came to their assistance had the satisfaction of knowing that nothing could stop the onrush of the Angelinian forces now. Only God could describe the scene of the battle for that extent of forty miles. It was a roaring inferno of cannons musketry, and flame, and looked like a seething forest fire instead of a battle, with a terrible slaughter to boot. A force of men attempted to force back a division of quailings, and succeeded in recapturing a line of rifle pits but not the main works. For three hours, fighting like mad men, and making charge after charge they fought desperately on, and every moment the irresistible tide of the Winkies and quailings pressed nearer and nearer looking to the glandelinians like hideous red demons from the frightful contortions of their enraged faces. One general was on the point of ordering his men to pour grape and canister into the ranks of the Abyssinkilians but he was defaunted and would not go. It would have been much better to have yielded even at the loss of the battle than to have suffered such loss for a head cause. The terrible firing of both sides in his last section of the conflict claimed among its victims not only the living, and wounded but the dead. All dead soldiers lying on all parts of the works were torn by bullets and grape shot as to be completely unrecognizable, and millions of trees resembled hickory brooms like in other battles, and lower shrubbery was completely mowed down. Grass was mowed down, the greatest losses in the conflict resulted right here.

THE SITUATION NINE DAYS AFTER THE BATTLE OF VIVIAN WICKERY.

Chapter 39.

One of the queerest sights in the centre of the christian positions after this three day and a half battle was a three story army barracks near Concentinian Aronburgs headquarters, standing with only one wall, the others having been blown away entirely by shell fire, leaving the floors supported by the partitions. In one of the big upper rooms could be seen a crucifix which had been exposed terribly to the shell fire of the captured guns and which was not even marred. In the upper works where the assault of the enemy had struck with diminished force there were many of the strangest scenes caused by the concussion of the great explosion. There many barracks were toppled over one after another in a perfect row, and left where they happened to lay. One barracks was turned completely over, and was seen standing with its roof on the foundations of another barracks, and its base in the air. The soldiers who had been in it soon came back from the firing line and getting into the building from the through the windows occupied the ceiling for bunk beds and so on to sleep and rest on. Out of this barracks a general and all his staff officers and many refugees who had been sheltered there, escaped safely, and were but little hurt, although all were stood on their heads by the house when it toppled over. Every barracks had its own story. From a general who was in the upper story he managed to escape by chopping a hole in the roof with the point of his sabre. From another officer he leaped to the ground as the house went over and fell thirty five feet upon a gun garrison and escaped with two broken legs. One clock was known to have stopped in concentinian Aronburgs ruined building by its spring being struck by the fragments of a grapes shot.

So vast was the fields of the disastrous battle nine days afterwards that to get an adequate idea from any point level with the christian lines of defence, to the enemies lines of fortifications and works, was simply impossible. It could have been better viewed from the heights of the main christian positions, from the tops of the captured Gvangelina Crania heights, just west of the town of Jennie Vivian the whole strange panorama could be seen.

Looking down from the Heights of Gvangelina Crania many things about the bloodiest battle of the siege, that appeared very inexplicable from below were perfectly plain. How so many many barracks within the christian lines, and even the enemy's lines within their half battered land fortifications happened to be so queerly twisted, for instance, as if water had not hit and not shells, and if the water had a twirling instead of a straight motion, was made perfectly clear.

The land section of the great Tumbolina fortification was built in almost an isosceles triangle with one big angle pointed squarely up the river and the other two to the east, from which most of the Angelinian attacks came from the land side. At the northern angle was the junction of the Sunbeam and Armida Creeks, and the southern angle pointed a little way toward the Nonestian ocean. Now about half of the angle, for formerly densely flanked by barracks was swept clear as a plate platter by the Christian shells during the bombardments, except for three or four camps of barracks that stand near the angle which points up the Norma River. The course of the Christian attacks early early during the bombardments and capture of Norma Catherine from the exact point where it issued from the main left of the besieging Christian line to where it crossed half below a turn in the river, and above by spreading itself over the flat districts or of five or six miles, was clearly defined. The whole swarm of Christian assaulting waves of troops issued straight from the captured city of Norma Catherine in a solid wave and tore across the whole region and so on to the main and sections of the enemy's outer works against the lower part of the triangle. Here a cluster of solid abut is aided by the information of the outer works evidently divided the assaulting Christian troops. The greater part turned to the north, and despite the fire it met swept up the line and by then mixed with the defenders of the works in a hand to hand fight, and drove the Glandelinians to the main works. The other stream of troops shot across the triangle was turned southward by the main bluffs like works and went up the valley of the Sunbeam Creek. The main works of the fortress had in the meantime acted as a barrier and turned the part of the current back toward the southeast, where the assailants with the help of their cannons finally finished the work of the triangle, turning again their assaults to the northward, and back to the main barrier. The stream of assaulting Christian troops that went up the Sunbeam Creek was turned back by the pressure of a Glandelinian counter assault but was reinforced by the back retrograde movement of the other troops, and again started south, where it reached over a mile and a half and spent its main force on the works held by General Kernville. The frequent strange turning of the stream of Christian assaults forced against the triangle of redans, and then the outer works, gave the assaulting Christian army something like a whirling motion, from left to right, and made a tremendous eddy of Christian troops whose apparent centrifugal force on onslaught was almost like a cyclone that twisted everything it touched. This accounted for the comparatively narrow path of the flood of Angelinian troops through the southern section of the forts outer works where its course through the thick, thickly clustered works and batteries was as plain as a high way, and where half of the assaulting Christian forces met annihilation, another portion about a quarter captured and the rest forced into a total rout which was followed by the enemy's tremendous counter assault. The force of the Glandelinian counter assault however diminished gradually as it reached the main Christian works, for at the point and place where the current of Glandelinian soldiers separated by the capture of seven line of works, every building or barracks within the Christian line was fairly ground to pieces by the enemy's concentrated artillery fire from every captured work, and further on in the rear the houses were only turned a little on their foundations from the concussion of shell explosions and the awful roar of so many thousands of cannon. Near the middle of the battle line they were turned over or half shattered, or thrown upside down or on their sides. Further down still they were not seen in single file but great heaps of ground lumber that looked like nothing so much as enormous pith balls. At the main section of the battle line where most of the Angelinian artillery was captured and turned in full force upon the Christian camps everything except the biggest buildings were crushed into fragments.

Many of the barracks that were left there scattered helter skelter/ thrown on their sides, and standing on their roofs, the effect of tremendous concussion were believed to never have been in that neighborhood before. Here the retreating Christian forces had come to the rear in panic before the breast of the oncoming tidal wave of Glandelinians from as far up as the last and main extreme line of oppositions, were forced safely beyond Aronburg's headquarters and the main outer works and railroad line of the Nic-Hollester and Evangeline St

Flare by the pressure of the Glandelinian assaulting columns at the dividing line, up and down before the flood, and finally rallied behind their main works. Here about three hundred yards behind was a row of barracks packed closely together and every one tipped about over about the same angle was only one of the queer freak the concussion and vibration of the artillery fire of both sides played. One of the girl scouts just for curiosity got into one of them in her walk through the battle smitten districts that day. The lower story had been filled with earth thrown in by explosions outside and everything in it had been torn out. The carpets on the floors of many rooms had been split into countless strips on the floors by the sheer force of exploding shells inside. Heaps of debris stood in the rooms of some floors.

Through no cause whatever known there was no vestige of furniture or military stores. The walls dripped with moisture. The ceiling was also gone, the windows were all dead, and the only thing that was left intact was a splendid crucifix. It still hung on the shattered wall and though much awry the frame and the image were unbroken. The motto above the crucifix looked like, looked grimly and sadly sarcastic. It was;

FROM HERE.

A most melancholy wreck of a barracks building that motto and crucifix looked down upon indeed. She also saw an enormous number of covered barracks and other army wagons strewn in wreckage in the middle of a company street, one of them sticking tongue and all straight up into the air, another on its main tail board, with the hind wheels almost completely buried in a pile of debris. She could not count the awful number of dead horses she saw. She saw a barracks building standing exactly in the middle of the company street, the whole side stove in by some explosion, and in the hole was the remains of a mangled line of horses.

Some general's library had been a stream over the company street by some explosion for she picked up a trail of good books, cover slips and others left half sticking in the wreckage of earth, and reaching for over two blocks. One barracks house by an explosion of a gun-carshell had been hurled over two others in the mysterious force of the blast, and then had settled on the two of them at once and there it stood unharmed, high up in the air, so its former occupants could have gotten into it again with long ladders. Even at the lower end of the storm of artillery fire where the force of so many explosions was greater, there was a row of barracks lying on their sides and held there by being fastened in the wreck of a long line of high fortified works and broken pieces of cannons and gun caissons. Through the sides of these houses the trunk of many a tree and pieces of wood had been driven by explosions like lances and there they stayed sticking out straight in the air. In the much of wreckage was many a gun caisson and far down the works near the debris about the railroad lines and formidable abutments were the legs of a horse. An upright centimeter cannon, with its support and wheels blown away stood straight up a little way off. What was once a set of costly cannon was strewn all about broken pieces of iron, and the once high works that had contained these cannons were nowhere now.

The remarkable stories that could be told of officers and their regiments retreating a mile up to the main works before the enemy's headlong advance during that frightful battle could be easily credited after seeing the evidence of the strange course the Glandelinians took in their advance to the general attack. Witnessed who stood as near to the battle line as they dared saw four brigades of Abbeccianians first retreat for half a mile, then rally behind a rail fence, and then move forward again, and then recoil. When they were seen to retreat so far to the rear that they had to be halted by strict discipline and where they were reinforced as they rallied near their vicinity of an old abandoned schoolhouse General Grubbers brigade retreated all the way from the first line of works, always rallying behind one after the other only to be forced back from time to time. When the general's brigade was carried past the last line of outer works the general could tell his officers to send a letter bidding his wife and children at Angelina Agathia good bye for him as he was sure today as he would not let his brigade retreat any further. The brigade was again rallied, and waged their own part of the battle with terrific fury while the general carried on a perfect conversation with his staff officers and giving directions for his burial if his body should be found when he was killed. Now ever an hour later the enemy were repulsed and the general and what remained of his brigade was safe. Three soldiers who retreated over a little bridge got into the branches of a tree and had to stay there all night before they could make anyone understand where they were. In their desperate struggles with so desperate an enemy the clothes of hundreds of thousands of Angelinian soldiers were fairly torn from them. At this stage of the battle more soldiers were killed by desperate hand to hand struggles than by long range firing or onslaughts. The largest numbers of soldiers fell in the counter assaults against the enemy on the other three days. Twenty one thousand bodies were taken out of one line of barracks in the early morning after the battle was over and buried. In many instances soldiers who were killed were found wedged in the abatis. They seemed to be in a good state of preservation, except for bullet holes in their chests abdomens or head. Parts of the abatis which were still standing seemed to be backed up with the fallen of both sides and it was like mining to make any kind of a clear space. Here the barracks were crumpled on one side of the works and on the other side untouched, a most remarkable thing considering the terrible power and force of shell fire and cannonading and mine explosions.

From one barracks which was wrecked thirteen thousand bodies were taken. None of these bodies were recognizable, and they were buried in trenches immediately. They were so badly decomposed that it was impossible to keep them until until they could be identified during a blast at the abatis two hundred bodies were almost blown to pieces. The order that was issued for all the dead to be rapidly buried was carried out. Large forces of men being put at work digging trench trenches and the remains of the dead soldiers of both sides were laid away as rapidly as possible possible possible.

General Sirbly Flynn had taken charge of the army of hundreds of thousands of soldiers who were doing a wonderful amount of work. One of the parties who worked at clearing away the dead came across one of the upper stories of a ruined barracks. It was merely a pile of timbers and boards apparently, but small pieces of gray beds from which the clothing had been burned showed the nature of the find. A faint odor of burned flesh prevailed exactly at this spot.

"Dig here boys," said the officer to the men. "There is some body at least quite close to the surface of the wreckage."

The soldiers started with a will. A large pile of army underclothing, and linen was brought up first. Presently one of the men exposed to the surprise of the others a charred lump of flesh and lifted it up on the end of a bayonet. It was all that remained of some poor officer or Angelinian soldier who had met an awful death between sharpened bayonet and fire. The corpse was put on a white cloth, the ends were looped up making a sort of bag out of it, and the thing was taken to the river bank and buried. It probably weighed fifty pounds. This was done in many cases to the bodies burned or not.

The actual loss of life or numbers of lives of this last most terrific battle of the siege will never be known, but over 14,000,000 bodies of the Angelinians were buried within nine days, and these together with the many hundreds of thousands of identified and unidentified corpses which were buried at sea, in the sands along the river beaches, in the company streets or behind the works, those cremated, the hundreds of thousands found along the river shore, on the shores of Wickey Bay, and those taken from the water, and finally all those discovered in all sorts of places, all these served to swell the death list to possibly 17,000,000 which was the probable figure named by General Constantin Aronburg, the tenth day after the big battle. He had every opportunity for obtaining information on this point. Until the awful cremation of all these bodies thus burned, the officers of the many thousands of various burial gangs made lists of the bodies disposed of by their men, but when it became again necessary to burn the corpses, the danger of pestilence being so great that they had to be put out of the way at the earliest possible moment, the compilation of these lists were abandoned, and a mere general estimate made.

The work of clearing away most of the battle wreckage proceeded but slowly, the soldiers in the many gangs added to this being enervated by the intense heat of the sun of October weather, also keened by the effluvia from the decomposing bodies of dead soldiers and horses, and depressed by the gloomy character of their awful surroundings. Most of the men of the refugees were also forcibly employed, many of whom had been in comfortable circumstances before the enemy swept away their belongings. In the majority of these cases the non-combatants who worked, had not only lost their earthly possessions, but comrades and members of their families as well, and were very heartsore and crushed in spirit. In the main, they engaged in this harrowing work, because they wanted to help the besieging armies out in their desperate straits, and for the further reason if not muddled in mind and body, they might possibly go mad.

Despite the facts that the shell fire of the Christians blew up the Thumelina fortifications and the land section of Lucille Ickeen it was a fact that the enemy would never have abandoned Wickey unless blown out if it had not been for the fact that General Manley was compelled to save the rest of the besieged by ordering the general to abandon the city. However the enemy first retired to the seaboard fortifications and from there for two months in every day fighting managed to get down the river and elsewhere out of the city inflicting losses terrible on the Angelinians. It was a peculiar and most astonishing way the enemy were able to abandon the city and half of the rebel army got away while the rest besieged too closely in Angelina Aronburg only held until the city was totally destroyed. The Angelinian army seeing the destruction of the section finally gave way at first and strove to escape, and thus in this way met destruction. Wickey was finally captured, and when the news was heard the whole world rejoiced in a manner that would take a thousand volumes like this to describe. Whistles in all factories blew, flags were displayed in the windows of every house in every city of every nation and immense parades and carnivals were held. Schools closed for a week in honor of the capture of Wickey, which insured the world sorrow was over, and the celebration was made in millions of other ways, like a wild exploding of fire crackers, and at night displays of fireworks and so on. The celebration was beyond description in Angelina, and children even held parades. It was one of the greatest victories in the war and well noted for the commander who won it, General Constantin Aronburg or Whillanberger Zimmermann, after two months of horrible fighting.

CHAPTER FORTY.

CONTINUATION OF THE ARONBURG RUN BATTLE: CONDITIONS OF THE GLANDOLINIAN GOVERNMENT RESOURCES.

BOARDING OF FORTIFICATIONS ALONG ARONBURG RUN.

BURNING OF TOWNS ON ARONBURG RUN. THE LOSS OF BIG NAVY YARDS.

Nearly a year

has already passed away since the last battle of the landico Angelinian, a war had reached up to this last battle of Aronburgs Run and since the many victorious armies of Angelinia had at last begun to bring the rebellion down under their own power with the capt ure of Vivian Wickey, and other important points. We can now hope dear reader in for the ending of this volume that as the preceding months or days pass by and as the reverberating echoes of the great battle of Aronburgs Run that shook the Calverinian and Angelinian country from one end to the other slowly die away that the war with the surrender of Manley will soon have its timely end. The duration of the war had already been fully four years and seven months a little more than half, and though the Christians had really met a severe defeat at Aronburgs Run, and though when it had ended and raged fiercely for two more days and ended with an abrupt defeat for general Hanson and the total retreat of the Christian army under him and other generals and most frightful losses it was nevertheless for certain that the cause for Glandolinia was totally lost.

The main body of Glandolinians who had been pressing the rebellion against his country states in a fierce manner had now found all the resources of his whole nation and his government in Glandolinia and Calverinia in a more deplorable condition than any nation in the world had ever suffered before. From exhaustive means to carry on the wicked rebellion the national treasures were empty, all big banks in the many large cities, and town and villages had gone completely bankrupt and both the army and navy had been placed far beyond reach for immediate use, in Glandolinia, and those in resources in Calverinia, such as Calverina, Vivian Wickey, Evangelina St. Claire and other points upon which the Glandolinians relied upon more than anything else to continue the war were now in the hands of the Angelinians, and half of the number of men in the war had been killed wounded or disabled. Most of all the scores of thousands of war ships, and vessels of various kinds such as transport ships in commission during the war were in the possession of the Christians and those not in their possession were in distant seas and many of the former naval officers being natives of Calverinia and Angelinia had desert ed the Glandolinian flag and joined the Nationals. Also this condition of affairs had been planned and arranged by the many secretaries of the Angelinian Navy and war in the full hopes of rendering powerful powerless and design the enemy may have for preventing the crushing of the wicked rebellion ever written about.

At this time while the Glandolinians now were failing most disgracefully at many places throughout Calverinia, and Aronburgs Run was the only signal but unimportant victory general attention began to be attracted to the main states of Abba Abbaemia further north and Manley who had therefore been victorious and who had pushed general Vivian back for many miles was ordered to leave off of general Vivian and attack the fortress of Eyes Klon at the Abyssinian border where general Francis Hander had recently transferred his large body of troops from Fortress St. Ann because of the threatening aspect of a Glandolinian invasion into Abyssinkilla since the fall of Aronburgs Run. The main question now came up as to the full and quick reinforcing and maintenance of this immense fortress. Once before during the early part of the fourth year of the struggle an attempt had been made to secure this fortress but the Winkie Abyssinkilians learning of the plotted attempts from general Hansons Secretary Secret ary prevented the entry into the border border of an enormous rebel army with artillery and provisions by firing upon it from immense redoubts on Morrison Run.

After due deliberation and notwithstanding the result of this attempt to be performed, by orders of Hanson Vivian who was then retreating from Aronburgs Run the Authorities of both Calverinia and Abyssinkilla decided that the fortress of St. Ann must be maintained and even reinforced. For this purpose an immense squadron of ships by sea and an army by land were sent on the ninth of September fourth year after. Only three of these ships out of a hundred reached the region of the coast line fort because of a great typhoon then raging on the Calverinian seas at that time. It was while these vessels were being tossed about and also being wrecked in the storm that the Glandolinians under an unknown general at that time moved forward to attack the fortress so as to open a way for the invasion of Abyssinkilla. General Hander had attempted to stop the enemys preparations preparations that had been made all around him by heavy firing night and day for weeks but he could do nothing while fortifications and batteries of all kinds were being rapidly erected on all sides and he was powerless to stop the work with his biggest guns. So soon as the strength of the Glandolinian positions in the region of this fortification was as assured the leaders in the work became eager for the fray and the fiercest bombardments of the war in the north began. Scores of thousands of shells, and that many more balls were hurled upon the fort and a fearful artillery contest raged on. Francis replied with all the power he could ever muster but his guns as he had seen before could not injure the fortifications and batteries opposed to him, while the immense lengthy walls and parapets of his fortress were shattered, many guns dismantled, and hundreds of big barracks on fire. For six days and nights more the bombardment continued with unabated fury and the last day of it it was pressed with greater energy. Already the garrison of this Abyssinkilian fort was in a most terrible condition, for they were out of provisions, almost all of the wooden structures housing scores of thousands of men in and out side of the fortification were still afire, and the heat and smoke were so unbearable that the men who survived were compelled to douse themselves in wet clothing to prevent themselves from being singed, and placed wet cloths over their mouths and noses to breathe. The fiercest bombardment continued until the gallant Abyssinkilian defender was compelled finally to raise the white flag and then a conference was held with the Abyssinkilian and Glandolinian commander which resulted as soon as possible in a satisfactory arrangement for the immediate arrangement of the abandonment of the fortress and so on the following morning September 20th the brave defenders of the Abyssinkilian fort were conveyed to the surviving ships on the river near by. From this most important outcome the Glandolinians declared that the war was now good as won and that at last after four years and seven months of hard fighting they have at last succeeded in humbling the Angelinian nation before the whole Christian world. It was believed by the very world itself at that that it was the first time in the knowledge of Abbaemia that the Abbaemian flag had been humbled. The Holy and Pelican Religious Emblem Flag which had never before been lowered to any nation either Christian or wicked before had now been humbled and humbled before the wickedest nation in the world if in the story. It was the first time that any Abbaemian flag had been lowered to an enemy under any conditions whatever.

The next day after the serious Christian defeat at the Abyssinkilian border the fall of the fortress of St. Ann was commemorated by many preachings, sermons, exultant blasphemies and songs and everything else throughout the whole nation of Glandolinia when the news was heard. Every Glandolinian general and all the people and even the Glandolinian King spoke exultantly of the result of that section of the conflict. For over four years the rebels had attempted to capture that most important place and had at last succeeded. However there was a different respect on the side of the Christians. The gallant defense of this fortress on the Abyssinkilian boundary by general Hander received great recognition among the whole of Angelinia and Abbaemia and they all showed their gratitude by substantial tokens, letters which filled his very place of residence so he had no room, presents of all kinds, and the like, and general or Governor general Vivian when he heard of the occurrence at once commissioned the general general, general A. Major general. The result of the cause and battle battle in the north so suddenly seemed coming on again and avowed the Angelinian nation the proper appreciation of the seriousness of the trouble that had come upon them, especially with the serious Angelinian defeat at Aronburgs Run.

Ben Hanson, the main ruler, with his brother, and King Cannon of Abbeonnia, and King Tinner of Abyssinkile who at first had hardly grasped the significance of the fact that Glandelinia though losing her main points one after another was far from being beaten yet had now thrown off all pretensions and after the fall of Fort St Anna had seized hundreds of fortresses, positions, important towns and villages and arsenals within the Abyssinkilian borders was now accused and on the day after the forced evacuation of Fort St Anna Hanson had ordered the Abyssinkilian ruler to at once rescind a proclamation in which he called upon Abyssinkile to resist the intended invasion of the Glandelinians in that location with all their force to protect their own country and prevent Abbeonnia proper from being invaded. From authorities and many other points and from the people in general a loud shout of approval and immense enthusiasm greeted this great call and order throughout all portions of Abyssinkile. Everywhere in Abyssinkile and Angelina and even Abbeonnia and other states millions of pretty colored flags went up everywhere, even in the spires of churches, on tree tops in parks, in catodials and in every window and roof of houses, and myriads of flags were stretched from one side of the streets of every town and city their full lengths, and all the women and children in these countries wore clothing of all brilliant colors and also ornaments and uniforms like flags. Scores of thousands of cannons were fired, and throughout the nation in every convention hall and our churches and other places enthusiastic meetings, addressed by great eloquent orators and even priests, and other persons, every kind of meeting and convention being held in every part of Abyssinkile and Abbeonnia and Angelina.

Throughout Abyssinkile alone the calls of the different authorities for troops in response to Hanson's order brought forth at seven or eight times the number of volunteers called for, and soldiers by countless countless numbers were seen marching toward the border and elsewhere to protect Abyssinkile from the threatened invasion or to resist it in case it could not be stopped or prevented. Immediately upon learning of Hanson's quick and great proclamation the chief of the southern Angelina also issued a call for troops and it was issued with the same force and lively enthusiasm as was so strongly manifested over the call in Abyssinkile. Simultaneously preparations were made by the Abyssinkilian authorities to recapture the immense armory and arsenal in possession of the rebels at the town of Santa Maria in Abyssinkile. Here were stored and in the possession of the enemy ninety million five hundred and ninety thousand muskets, plenty of ammunition for all those muskets and many cannons and even even ammunition for those also. The Glandelinian commander of this post general Roger Starring a Zimmermanian general had learned of the impending danger and so was fully prepared for it. As soon as he heard that about two million five hundred thousand Abyssinkilian militia mostly the fierce intrepid Winkies were on their way with cavalry support and artillery to seize the strong post and were but a mile or so away from the region, he had his troops set fire to the whole town, and his barracks and own encampments and all buildings in the location location, and then escaped with his army across a large railroad bridge spanning the Erinie Run river and retreated into northern Calvernia, and thence to Glenoria. The Winkies were thus prevented from recovering the large quantity of firearms and other provisions and guns they so ardently expected, but they took possession of the abandoned works and fortifications of stone and made it a most important point for future operations against the rebels. Another assault by the Winkie Abyssinkilians was also directed against a large captured Navy yard, St. Elizabeth Run, also on the Erinie Run and was more successful. It contained about twenty two thousand pieces of heavy cannon, a large amount of ammunition and provisions of war, large amount of naval stores, and in the waters around it were hundreds of ships including twenty warships. The post had been before captured by general Aberdeener who for fear the post would be retaken by the Abyssinkilians had the ships and vessels in the river either scuttled or blown up by mines and torpedoes. Just as this had been accomplished, general Starring Sapuldington who recently had been appointed to Aberdeener's place arrived on the scene and ordered the further and entire destruction of all the property at the navy yard of the Abyssinkilians.

But when the Abyssinkilians broke into the strong post they managed after severe fighting with both enemy and fire to save most of the heavy guns, and a good number of the ships. This important post was now recovered by the rebels again. Soon after this a sudden and extra demand for enormous numbers of troops had been made throughout Abyssinkile and Angelina the leaders of the Angelinians themselves throughout the region of war ever, where began active preparations for the overthrow entirely of the whole rebellion, while the Glandelinians themselves simultaneously began to make a last supreme effort for the capture of the National Capitol of Abyssinkile, having failed in Calvernia and Angelina. If they failed here hopes to win the rebellion would be hopelessly lost. The wicked Glandelinian King and even the wicked Manley and many of his generals started the cry anew "On to Angelina, down with Christianity and Angelina!" and it was taken up and resounded throughout all of Calvernia possessed by the Glandelinians and Glandelinia itself. Seeing that most of the Glandelinian forces had been wasted and driven out of Calvernia, and that Manley only remained and as desperado and that Glandelinia had been disastrously invaded several times fresh troops were rapidly marshaled into service in Glandelinia, and all of the orators and Glandelinian books, magazines and all news papers and the like urgently demanded the final effort of attacking Angelina Agathia. One of the Glandelinian papers declared:

"Never in the world or since the rebellion which has already raged for four years and seven months was half of the unanimity among all of our people of Fair Glandelinia before, either still in Calvernia or in Glandelinia nor the trial of the seal upon any Glandelinian subject that is now manifested to make another effort to take Angelina Agathia and drive from it and out of Calvernia and Angelina every black hearted Angelinian and Abbeonnian soldier who have their armies still there. From all of our mountain tops of Calvernia, and Glandelinia, and elsewhere and valleys to the shores of the sea there should be one wild effort and fiercer resolve than there had ever been before to capture Angelina Agathia, the National Capitol of Abbeonnia and to capture it at all human hazard and at any cost."

Indeed the new preparations for the seizure of Angelina Agathia and her outpost cities had been all this while been made in secret and general Hanson, Givian or all of the subjects of Angelina knew nothing whatever of the plans and contemplated attack until then. The forces of the Glandelinians were fully ready to make it, and that was before the great gun had been made to rage. But as at that time many calls for more troops continually had been issued, and in Angelina large armies of men from both Dorothy Gale, and Oona were soon on their way to protect the government city of Angelina State and its rulers and Angelina Agathia in proper.

The first mobilization corps of Dorothy Gale was the first of these to answer the call for Angelina Agathia's protection by sending one of its divisions prepared armies toward Angelina Agathia. Other big armies immediately followed, and on account of its nearness to Angelina Agathia the troops of Dorothy Gale was the first to reach the city of Angelina Agathia. The soldiers from Dorothy Gale met with severe resistance from the retreating Manley army on their arrival at the town of Betsy Bobbin especially from a small section of the Glandelinians whom they encountered unexpectedly, and who in retreating had wished to make all the way a barrier across the pathway of the pursuing Angelinian troops belonging to Hanson, Givian who were coming in two sections from the north and west at the same time, but when the army from Dorothy Gale reached the town of Betsy Bobbin and were marching through the town and reaching a certain place outside of it fully 10,000,000 Glandelinians of the main retreating Glandelinian army had rallied and thinking this new army was a part of Hanson's advancing force assailed the Angelinians furiously. A most severe fight ensued, in which three million of the Angelinians were killed wounded or missing and nine million of the assailants were routed out of the survivors of the rebels. Intense excitement was produced indeed by this tragic battle of Betsy Bobbin, as it was another dreadful shedding of blood close to Angelina Agathia. Upon the arrival of the soldiers in Angelina Agathia they found that all the main communications between that big city and all of Angelina and Calvernia by telegraph, telephone and all railroads and by boat also had been cut off entirely by the retreating enemy and the capital of Angelina was therefore found to be in a most critical condition and the most intense anxiety and fear and ever disencouragement was seen throughout the whole of Angelina for several weeks.

Then the Angelinian Defensive committee held a grand conference and at this conference a sudden plan of action was formed and immediately put into quick operation. More than a million of troops and supplies and provisions were immediately sent forward, and in a very short time the main Angelinian capital was again out of all danger and Manley was still retreating. General Richard Kindermann with a large army of Winkie Abyssinkilian troops opened communication with Angelinia Agathia and many other points by seizing the many railroads between Galverine proper (Galverinia) and the Ark Angelinia capital and taking possession of all points near and around Angelinia Agathia, nine miles from Dorothy Gale. It was now clearly perceived that the number of militia given to protect Angelinia Agathia from the final blow would not be strong enough despite the strength of the forts and fortresses of Angelinia Agathia to cope with the new Glandelinian forces advancing from Glandelinia to be arrayed against Angelinia Agathia and another demand was made on September fourteenth calling for more troops about sixty four million and eighteen million for the navy which was also ordered to cease the defense by water. Angelinia Agathia, Dorothy Gale, and Oona, and also Doty Bohlin and the town of Trot and the Girlknools became great citadels as they were made the rendezvous for all troops concentrating there to defend the capital. Every hour hundreds of thousands of soldiers had poured into those cities or into their defenses, and all the generals and other officers were quartered in the public buildings.

General Manley who had received heavy reinforcements had advanced again and was making hasty preparations to lay siege to Angelinia Agathia. Manley's first step in his plan of siege was to arrange for the erection of a strong line of great batteries of the heaviest and deadliest guns on all the heights in the region of Angelinia Agathia, especially the heights of Carnation ridge, White Rose Hill, and the Mic-Holleston ridge, which commanded a good view of Angelinia Agathia and all the regions near Glorinia and elsewhere where the greatest battle of the war had formerly raged. But before all this work could be started, most of the armies that could find quarters in either the encampments or the towns on account of their immense numbers had taken possession in all their strength of all of those heights and also of Glorinia, the Big Girlknools, and all stretches of Mic-Holleston Run and Harrietia. General Roswell Buster Johnson's Abyssinkilians and other troops were among those armies, and crossed to Glorinia in ships and boats.

Another immense army of soldiers was sent over all the remaining bridges in this region and another across Jennie's Bridge. These latter troops under General Charles Brown erected new redoubts and took possession of all the old works on Carnation ridge and all these new redoubts were built on the spot where General Manley had proposed to erect his own batteries to lay siege to Angelinia Agathia. He found therefore that a siege could not be effected. In the meantime while all preparations for the defense of Angelinia Agathia were being made General Fredrickson Parson had been sent to a portion of the Angelina Run, near Portress Mic-Holleston with a large fleet of armed ships to dislodge a portion of a Glandelinian battery on Blanket Pen. at the near mouth of the Angelina Run where it ran into the Aronburgs Run. This was soon accomplished after a very sharp and bloody engagement in which two ships of the Angelinians were sunk with the loss of all on board. General Parson then came up the same river, and at the branch of St. Anne creek about two miles below Angelinia Agathia, he encountered some more heavy batteries. Another sharp fight took place, with no immediate result. A day later an attack was again made on the same point but the fleet was repulsed with almost annihilation and Parson wounded and two of his aid generals killed with the captains of every ship killed or wounded and the entire number of soldiers and sailors and marines killed or wounded. For all during the time of these last operations around Angelinia Agathia these batteries defied all the Angelinian vessels, and for a time these streams were effectively blockaded.

The attempt to capture Angelinia Agathia opened briskly in the latter part of September. A body of Angelinians was badly routed under general Phillip at the region of Glandelinia (Angelinia) and a little later the same body of Christians received a severe blow from the Glandelinians under general Calmann Shoman at Banderberry creek. The conflict was severe and short. The Glandelinians under general Shoman belonging to Manley's command being one of the best disciplined of the army previous to this had been doing nothing whatever and upon Manley's order it had been therefore ordered to move forward and make a sortie to test the strength of the defenses and to also report to general pin picknellian who was on his way to attack a portion of general Kindermann's army. Shoman's division covered ground in three or four hours and then started to attack the Christian troops under Phillip. They therefore reached the encampments of this army of Christians and in the evening at once attacked it with all the fury they could muster. The defense of the Angelinians was desperate, but they were overwhelmed, their flank was attacked and thrown into confusion and soon the result was a most complete rout, the Angelinians seeking shelter in the wooded region near Dorothy Gale. These movements of Shoman got Kindermann suspicious and caused him to move a portion of his forces from his left and have it take up a position near Mendi on the Erinie creek the scene of general Robert Vivian's defeat by Garamia Vivian his son during the early part of the war.

While all this was going on in the western section of Angelinia Agathia there were stirring events near the Mic-Holleston Dolorine fortifications two miles south of Dorothy Gale. General Manley had been planning to make an effort to capture that stronghold, and general Calmann Shoman was sent down the Blanket Bay Peninsula with an immense force for that purpose, while general Roswell Buster Johnston, in command of a force of Abyssinkilians was taking measures to oppose him. A large detachment of Abyssinkilian troops commanded by general Hropero Vivian and also consisting of a portion of general Harson's Johnson's former army, was sent out from Dorothy Gale to Little Girl Knool where it was arranged by Harson himself they were to be joined by divisions of troops from general Kindermann's command which was composed of both battalions of Abyssinkilian and Angelinian troops and a battery of a hundred light field pieces in charge of general James Cannon, of the regular Angelinian army. At these two columns approached each other the first was attacked by the Glandelinians and routed and dispersed before it had the chance to join the other. The other column under Cannon not knowing of the disaster that had happened continued to march on toward Little Girl Knool the former battle ground near Angelinia Agathia. Here was a large force of Glandelinians two miles from there ready to oppose them. There was a short but very severe engagement, and the Angelinians were badly repulsed. At this bloody battle another friend of the Vivian girls their best one and oldest too was killed—general James Cannon. This defeat of the Angelinians, and the death of so noble a general, and the slaughter of half of his command and a capture of a quarter more greatly alarmed all the people of Angelinia Agathia. It caused the most intense excitement, but other and more important events soon occurred to attract the attention of the Angelinian world.

One of the most extraordinary sessions in the world in this history if you please to mention assembled at the Angelinian national capital, and divided into many sections of sessions in other more important buildings than throughout the whole Angelinian country on the nineteenth day of September if that month still exists. It was called by all further titles of Angelinia to take immediate action upon all kinds of cases of saving Angelinia Agathia from capture and to over throw the glandolinian insurrection as soon as possible. The new condition of Calvernia also in her deplorable state had demanded the prompt attention of all the highest and lowest legislatures in the country of Abbeconia. And Angelinia. The full sway of the great war was still in earnest, and matters were to be growing worse instead of better despite the fact that victory was now in the possession of the Angelinians. And to make matters still worse both inside and outside the Angelinians or no capital city plans were being made to cause its capture. General Monty and his at all surviving highest generals, having received reinforcements were coming with a large force of Abbeconians was preparing to march upon the city and sent an expedition against Dorothy Gale and Gama at the same time and to make things doubly worse for general Hanson give in all of the public buildings of Angelinia Agathia, and her own congresses and even in the Popen Vatican unknown to the search and seizure of all kinds were believed to be prowling about bent upon all kinds of deadly and base purposes.

It certainly was one of the most critical times of Angelinia Agathia entirely and the members of the national legislatures throughout all of the Angelinian states responded promptly to the call for the extra session. There were governors of every state, all representatives and every one of extra authority from all of the states of Abbeconia and even in his own efforts general Hanson decided to have all the action that was not actively engaged elsewhere to be concentrated at Angelinia Agathia and her important towns near her no one make the safeguarding in the preservation of the city of Angelinia Agathia a shod and a short and decisive one.

Over the situation at Angelinia Agathia now enthusiasm went fever heat. Men and even children throughout the nation who survived the horrors of the war in Calvernia were aroused as well as women and children in Angelinia and Abbeconia including Abyssinians and even and even girl children demonstrated their heroism and patriotism by leaving homes and loved ones to attend the millions of wounded and dying in the war hospitals throughout the country and old in the camps and even prisoners and preparing line barbed wire and so on. Immense numbers of associations were formed by women for their most benevolent work. At this time having been injured in some other of their own works and also having been taken sick several times since the last experience with the enemy Violet and her sisters and their three girl heroines had been the leader of many of these movements of mercy and who had always given their services to the government of Angelinia and Abbeconia, and scores of thousands of girls following them and even boy and girl scouts gave their own services to Violet and her sisters and their three girl friends gratuitously, all taking or making attempts to organize splendid systems of providing comfort for the so countless sick and wounded soldiers of even both sides. Even though for a while there was no more active activity in Angelinia as yet there were many wounded soldiers everywhere on account of the recent battles just passed and without receiving any rewards whatever of anything these young girl heroines and Princesses of mercy had already as we know in the day and even night throughout the war far far to spy on the enemy, help the dangerous scouting parties and to work also for the relief of all the soldiers who suffered from wounds or sickness and did all they could to liberate children who were placed, they had now already know went from the battle field to back to field either when the fearful carnage was over or when it still raged, from camp to camp, and also from hospital to hospital, or from town to town and though little girls the Virgin girl Princesses had superintended the operations of the vast army red cross nurses and administering with their very own hands physical comforts of the suffering and soothing the troubled spirits of the invalid or dying soldier with voices low, sweet and attractive and always burdened with words of encouragement, he heartfelt sympathy and even religious consolation. They also had thousands of devoted self sacrificing girls and women and boy and girl scouts all over the land under their supervision serving with equal a zeal in the way of various camps and hospitals of the National army and no greater service was displayed by any amount of Angelinian soldiers in the field than was shown everywhere throughout the war a stricken country by these Angelinians, women, and girl and boy scouts.

While the three glandolinians under general Gaborunda Shoonamda were now gathering near Girl Knool that is little girl Knool awaiting an opportunity to march upon Dorothy Gale first to open a way to the Angelinian capital any many detachments of her army were sent out all along the line of the upper Angelinian gun from Big Girl Knool to Rosa and Topsy on foraging expeditions. And also general Hanson given in Angelinia Agathia was surrounded among the citizens there to save the capital to enlist men there who were not in the army and to raise three hundred and sixty five million dollars for to carry on the resistance for the defense. Hanson proposed to raise the same money by a sudden increase of taxes and so on. These suggestions were carried out at once the city preparing to raise out of its own resources out of fifty million. The hundred thousand more troops for Hanson's purpose and made a appropriation of six hundred million dollars to defray the expenses of the defense of Angelinia Agathia.

In the meantime one of the battles on the foraging expedition came into contact with an Abyssinians, roughest ever passed sharp struggle occurred but the glandolinians were defeated but soon a few hours later returned and captured the small place and also St. Vincent's Church and St. Joseph's Hospital at which latter place many other names after were occurred. Also in the latter part of September general Picknell's glandolinians with ten million men all Abbeconians started out from Dorothy Gale to make an attack upon Little Rosa town, near Girl Knool where general Picknell in charge of the glandolinians at this point had his headquarters. At the same time he proposed to send as a soon as possible four million troops under general Charles Brown toward the same point by way of Tropic town still another division under general Evans proceeded to a point westward of Tropic to prevent general Picknell's glandolinians from joining Monty at Big Girl Knool.

Approaching Little Girl Knool general Gaborunda learned that general Cornace Franklin with a large body of Abbeconians and Abyssinians the most desperate of glandolinian fighters was strongly entrenched in front of Little Rosa town just in the rear of Picknell's position. Fighting to dislodge Picknell's glandolinians before attacking Picknell, Gaborunda sent forward general Howard Gamett with a large force of Abyssinians and glandolinian troops and a large of cavalry also for that purpose. This division took a very difficult route around to that section of the rebel position. Here the glandolinians fought night of their advance and the glandolinian general Franklin with nine hundred thousand men armed with muskets and cannon, attacked the Angelinians fiercely. The battle was a very hot one for the size of the forces contending but general Howard at last succeeded in driving the glandolinians back with great loss and taking possession of the position. The glandolinian general Franklin however soon got his two troops together again and being reinforced was about to make a fierce attempt to retake the lost ground when he heard of the swift approach of general Kindorne and so disappeared in the following night without waiting to be attacked. Attacked. Kindorne however pursued so hard that he succeeded in catching up with him and compelled him a surrender with six hundred thousand men. Being thus left unprotected general Picknell also began to withdraw in the darkness.

CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS... 111 (11)

ABOUT the middle of the month of September general Sam Calamania phocammia with his main force of glaudelintians consisting of six-hundred-thousand, Gamarine, and gannaromianians and a gargoylian navy force supported by heavy artillery moved northwest in the direction of Longdon and Rooblen; an important position in a long curve of the six-hundred-lun River bay. It was garrisoned by about three million Angelintian troops under general J. m. j. Jones fielding; phocammia reached its vicinity two days later and immediately besieged it with about twenty milli-million men. This was on the twenty seventh of September and although general general fielding was already supplied with heavy guns and provisions and ammunition to sustain a siege he gallantly defended the post against the overwhelming numbers until the morning of the twenty eighth when through the sheer destructio-of the fortress he was compelled to surrender. General Hannon vividly h immediately sent an army of more than thirty million men to relieve this terrible disaster to the christian cause by driving general Phocammia and his men out of the region. This army moved in five long columns supported by artillery under generals Gunderide, Francis punner, ghapharna Brown, Anderson punner and Greathunter. It was composited by one hundred and eighty six heavy guns and one thousand men al small guns. General Hannon declared t his generals and to the government of Angelinia Arathla his plans were to go right through the glaudelintian army to porothy Gale.

While the battle ships fired heavily on Trot the troops landed 1 near Cathlington and at once attacked that post. Although this post had been reinforced by several black Brooks, the Angelinos troops managed to capture it after a very severe combat, but owing to a very heavy fire of artillery from a large line of bluffs at Little Trot, they were unable to hold it and soon withdrew 1 with captured rebels, and horses and artillery. General Amador Haddon commanding the forces at Little Trot immediately opened his heaviest batteries of guns upon them and tried to cut off the retreat of the christians with a large body of fire h troops that he sent against them across the water. Although again there was a most severe struggle general Evans managed to fight his way back to his transports and his force finally escaped under cover of the fire from the long line of thirty eight batt ships. The loss in the engagement was fifty thousand Angelinos and sixty thousand Glanclians. The situation in western Angelina Arabia which seemed to have now been crushed was renewed several da a later. General Ambrose Edwin Fuller was then in full charge of the forces led by Mitchell and Ghosman. is main headquarters were at Blank Brook in Owen county. Plans were so carefully made by which general John Floyd quaker was to drive general Glanclians across the river, and Ghosman was to disperse the main army under general Glanclians, successor of the general throatshot who fell earlier in the war at Genshaly and in this way make possible upon this a final desperate assault upon On Owen town.

A few more vigorous movements on the part of the Angolinian troops in the western region of Dorothy Gale soon put an end to the enemys attempts in that part. Also late in September a strong expedition composed of eighty glandelinian transports, and fo forty eight warships, under Admirals and Generals leaving about nine hundred thousand land troops commanded by general Isner Mylats left the rear of Manleys encampments and positions for the planket Bay Inlet at the main entrance to which off the north Angolinia Agathia river coast the Angolinians had erected two immense rock redoubts or forts of earth and stone. By a desperate assault on these forts by both land and water Isner Mylats succeeded in capturing them without much loss to either side in killed or wounded. A portion of general Pensils Omarians division with their commander was left to garrison the captured position, and the expedition returned to Manleys rear to guard it two days after this another expedition was sent out from the rear of Manleys lines. This was composed of fifty big glandelinian dradnaughts, and many transports commanded by Admiral Anterton, and one hundred and fifty thousand troops under general Isner Mylats again. After passing through a severe tempest of shot and shell from fortifications erected on the shore all of the vessels with the exception of two warships and ten transports which had been wrecked gatgathered at the entrance toward the outlet of Angolinia Agathia junction between the waterways of Dorothy Gale and Osmas. The entrance to this sound of the river was guarded by six immense christian batteries, while within the streams wasto big flotilla of armed warships commanded by Admiral Tainbell, late of the glandelinian navy, who had before the outbreak of the war composed the Angolinian cause. On the morning of October the first Isner Mylats silenced the six batteries after a most tremendous cannonading and attacked and drove the christian fleets into more shallow water. The glandelinian troops then took possession of the batteries and the neighboring islands in the river so that at the close of September already it began to be ascertain that the glandelinia glandelinian authority was again supreme over the river islands from Aronburgs Run to the mouth of that river. At the same time at the advising of Hanson vivian Conventinian Aronburg assumed command of all the armies of Angolinia Agathia as the forces around her and her towns were called after the other battle of Girknool. He had throughout the ar been so popular that when a few months afterwards general Kindernine resigned his place as general in chief of the armies on account of wounds and ill health, Conventinian Aronburg was appointed to that very office. All the time already he had been at work reorganizing the great armies there especially the one which had been shattered by the second terrible blow at Mambi.

The success of General Insu Mylsoke in capturing important posts near Angelinia Agathia soon caused the fitting out of a third naval expedition. And it was also about this time that the whole country was stirred up over the capture of two Angelinian generals on their way to Angelinia Agathia down the Aronburgs run river. On September the last General Noro viviania and wionstia who had been appointed to come to Angelinia Agathia to take command of armies there sailed from Ozma town for Dorothy Gale. After reaching there they embarked for Angelinia Agathia in the Abyssinian trap transport November intending to go to Angelinia Agathia in the regular way for that important river port. Soon after the November sailed the glandelinian warship Jacinto Tantermergo stopped near Dorothy Gale for the purpose to fire some shots into the town and her captain Evans Floyd learned of the movements of the two christian generals on the ship coming toward his warship. He at once went after the November and overhauling her demanded the delivering delivery of the two Angelinian generals. the two generals refused to leave the ship under any conditions. The ship was therefore bombarded and it was compelled to strike the white flag and the whole crew including the two brave generals were compelled to surrender. They were taken on board the glandelinian warship, and conveyed to the Manleys lines where they were placed in one of the prison camps as prisoners of war. Indeed while this deliberate act was loudly applauded by the glandelinians everywhere the Angelinian governments throughout the nation called it a wicked outrage and followed up a peremptory demand for the release of the two generals held prisoners by preparing to enforce the demand by shooting down all glandelinian prisoners held in Dorothy Gale. But their preparations came to naught for acting upon the principal that the two generals at the time were sailing under a neutral flag, and that a ship is protected by its general Manley allowed the generals to be released. This affair in indeed caused a great deal of excitement in the whole world but it soon subsided. At the same time a third expedition was or had been prepared for an attack upon the fortress at Beldon gun. This consisted of two hundred warships commanded by Admiral Goldilocks and bearing six hundred and sixteen thousand troops under general Ambrose Edwin Frustrance. The fleet left Manleys main rear of the river positions on the eleventh of October for the region of Beldon gun and its fortresses and Paulice Bend on the river coast. Indeed Beldon gun was strongly fortified with many glandelinian batteries and earthworks and fortresses commanding the small strw stream on either side but in possession of Angelinians under general Sewell Ant chustz. An attack of great violence was made upon these works, batteries, and fortifications the first week of No October. General Goldilocks took a fleet of a hundred and seventy ships into the river and opened on the batteries. These broadsides received a heavy response from the batteries and from a fleet of merrimacs and rams and gunboats and two warships commanded by Commodore Linch. The bombardment lasted for a full day and night without ceasing and the next morning about a hundred thousand troops were landed on the shore. Later in the morning these troops led by general Foster attacked a strong line of works and entrenchments that stretched across the shore. The redoubts one after the other after desperate fighting were captured although the Angelinians, far inferior in numbers, made a most gallant defence and shot down scores of thousands of their assailants. A particularly brave stand was made in the last redoubt but through a most furious charge by general Hawthorne's Zimmoannians they were compelled to beat a hasty retreat before the enemy, and sub it to capture after another but short fight. Thus Beldon gun passed into the hands of the glandelinian forces and Angelinia Agathia was nearer approached by the rebels than ever before in the war. Other portions of the shore line near here included including two works near Dorothy Gale were speedily captured after sanguinary fighting. Indeed these losses produced great depression throughout the region of Angelinia Agathia and the whole nation itself as it opened a way by which both Dorothy Gale and Angelinia Agathia might be successfully attacked and captured by the rear.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO BUTTON-TWO-SHOE PLEASE. 43

AMBROSE FULLER DRIVEN INTO MUMBI---BATTLE OF COLERIDGE---GENERAL MITO-RAE STANCKS BRAVERY---BATTLE OF EUGENE---AMBROSE FULLER TRANSFERRED TO THE WEST OF ANGELINIA AGATHIA---SIEGE AND CAPTURE OF FORTS KINGSLEY AND TURNER. THE ASSAULT ON FORTRESS TERNYSONIA---COMELY FLIGHT OF TWO WICKED GLANDELINIAN GENERALS AND THEIR TROOPS---UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER OF A CHRISTIAN ARMY AND ITS GENERAL---ANGELINIAN RETREAT FROM CHAMBERLAINE---CAPTURE OF OUTER WORKS NEAR DOROTHY GALE---BATTLE OF ST I VESIVES....

NOW WHEN general Concentinian Aronburg Gertrude Angelines uncle assumed main command of the Angelinian armies under Hanson's instructions he placed general Robert Gustaf Johnston Heller in charge of a very large body or army of Abyssinian troops to oppose general Ambrose Fuller who had received large reinforcements from a portion of Manleys army and gathered them together in the region of S. Gouri. General Heller indeed did his work right well, acting with great vigor and also with great skill. By a number of sharp effective blows here and there during small battles he succeeded in preventing other reinforcements and organized Omurian troops from joining A. Ambrose Fuller, and soon compelled the latter to withdraw toward Mumbi for supplies, ammunition reinforcements and safety. General Ambrose Fuller however receiving more and more reinforcements soon moved back toward Dorothy Gale with the purpose of threatening it and was preparing to form strong encampments near there, when Concentinian Aronburg's troops under general S. R. Denby Hindale Joice, Jacksonia Andrew, Cannon Zoe R. ae, and Phelan cannon drove him away after a series of severe battles and hundreds of skirmishes in a weeks time and forced him back again with great loss into Mumbi. This small campaign beginning in September and lasting a week had indeed been very active, sixty or seven severe but small durated battles and hundreds of skirmishes having been fought. This loss on both sides during this weeks campaign in killed wounded and prisoners was considered to be about 12,000,000. When general Gustaf Heller had driven the glandelinians under Ambrose Fuller into Mumbi he encamped in a strong position in the vicinity of Coleridge. In the meantime general Ambrose Fuller had been joined by general Earl Rodney Cannon who brought with him from the south of Mumbi, generals Stanck Hanson, Jinjur Hansen and McIntosh Judas Cannon if you please. General Rodney Cannon took personal command of these immense forces which he believed to number about twenty five million men and immediately led them out to cut off general Concentinian Aronburg's encampments. General Concentinian Aronburg learned through his numerous scouts and also boy scouts and signal corps of the approach of this vast division of glandelinians and at once concentrated his own immense army in the Luna valley near Coleridge so that on the morning of October Seventh general Rodney Cannon had by a flank movement gained Concentinian Aronburg's rear. He found that general's army in strong battle array. Generals Denby Joice, and Jacksonia Andrew commanding the first second and third division divisions of Abyssinian troops were on the left of Concentinian Aronburg's army, general Cannon Zoe R. ae in the centre was with the third division, and the fourth and fifth and also sixth and seventh was under Phelan Cannon which formed the right. The line of battle extended for fourteen miles and was one of the fiercest contests yet. The contest had opened toward morning of the eight day of October and continued throughout the whole day with fearful fury and intensity, without either side gaining the slightest advantage or losing any of their positions. The losses on both sides were tremendous. Stanck Hanson and Judas Cannon being among the killed and Ambrose Fuller and Jinjur Hansen was wounded. At night both armies rested on their arms while general Aronburg Homer succeeded general Fuller who had been severely wounded.

and wounded and the other side about three times the number.

During this time the war was also kindling in the region of kittens.

Joachim's ones were near the Christian armies commanded by general John P. Phelan.

These and most desperate attempts were made to take possession of that point by the Glandelinians. General H.H. Aronburg Federal, a Mic-Hollestonian if you please with two million three hundred thousand Mic-Hollestonians and ten million Zimmermanians and Scoodlers, met of them rough Gln Glandolinian cowboys and rangers attempted to move against the fortified territory in early October. Hal Having such a strong force of Glandolinians as it was heretofore utmost confidence of success and march marched slowly toward Fort Herdrude on the "Little Rio Grande to attack general general John H Thomas Phelan's army of Angelinians. But finding that general and his big army ready to meet him on good ground, and having only light field pieces, and no cavalryband having an insecure position he retreated to the Aronburggun and took up a strong position out of reach of that force. Then by a series of fierce skirmishes he managed to draw general Phelan and his troops out. The latter began advancing on the Angelinian Comde Confederates, whom a large body of fierce Scoodler Glandelinians horse and foot, armed with guns of all sorts and bowie knives and bayonets and supported by artillery mostly machine guns burst from their positions in a thick wood and charged furiously and with utmost desperation on ten of the Angelinian batteries commanded respectively by generals Adiraas Jenton and George George Erpet. Although the fierce attack of the Glandelinian cavalry was driven back with dreadful slaughter, the Scoodler infantry bravely pressed forward through a hurricane of grapeshot, shell, balls, bullets, and captured the battery under general Mac-rae Stanck. The gallant defender defended the line of a hundred guns as long as possible but was shot dead while trying to hold his guns at their positions and while also sitting astride a cannon and fighting obstinately against his assailants with a pistol. The remainder of the Angelinian soldiers hard pressed by the Zimmermanians and Mic-Hollestonians coming to the support of the Scoodlers soon broke and fled to the shelter of the Fort. General Aronburg Federal being severely wounded during the bloody fray did not follow up his victory but hurried to his positions at Gloriana Santa Fe' which he also captured after a desperate struggle in the afternoon but could not hold on account of the desperate condition of his army of and of his own wounds. He was the day later driven out of the region.

the day later driven out of the region.

Als o the region of the southern and western section near Dorothy Gale was also at this time held by an immense army, of Scoodlers and Winkie Zimmermanians under general Purgatorian Bicknell, an able landelinian officer, and veteran soldier who had served for a long time. When general Manly Manley had made up his mind to capture Angelina Agathia at all at risks general Purgatopian Bicknell had had relieved from his superior a large force of Scoodlor Zimmermanians, Omarians and yic-Hollesstinians at Boppe Lamsin Green and strengthened all of the positions of general Ambrose Fullers at Mombi and Jennie's Brige Bridge. Right across this region r extending toward Dorothy Gale were a series of fortified posts d fending all approaches toward Dorothy Gale and Ozma, the most important of which were Fort Kingslay, on a bend of the Aronburge Run, and Fort Urmuranna on the Angeline Run. At the same time His Excellency general James Gacon O-rief had a very large force of Angelinian troops at Kittans picherts and other points, and had strengthened various advanced posts to hold the foe back from Dorothy Gale. He had altogether about nearly one hundred and fourteen million men at his command. They were arranged in four immense armies under many great generals but commanded personally and respect ively by Major generals Kindernino Cornose, Germaine picharsson, Joe Jennings Calman Hodges and Thomas L. Allenberger and aid ed by a hundred brig adier commanders and other officers of low and high rank.

This immense army occupied a long irregular line across the whole region near Dorothy Gale almost parallel with that of the immense army of Glandelinians. On October the seventh general James Aronburg with a large army of infantry and cavalry went out and dispersed a larger force of Scoddler glandelinians under general Humphrey Zimmermann, and Marshall Aronburg at Kettleleaf on a slight ford of the Aronburgs run stream. For his great gallantry on this occasion general James Aronburg was commissioned a captain general. A few days later October ninth an important battle was fought with savage fury at Caruso Grove near Kittens Richerts Run on the borders of the Mid-Hollerster Run River. General Thomas Phelan was sent there with his army to immediately attack the strongly entrenched glandelinian encampments, then in charge of general Purgatorian Bicknell. The glandelinians here led in person by general Honsie Kilschchild came out in strong force to meet him. The two forces met on the morning of October the ninth and a severe conflict ensued with infantry and artillery and raged all day long with such fury and savagery that it appeared to be a wholesale massacre of troops of both sides. General Kilschchild was shot dead and his army cut to pieces and defeated with total rout. They fled into the region of Mombi in total rout and utmost confusion. This staggering blow indeed was a great and most telling one on the glandelinians indeed. It broke a good part of their line before Dorothy Gale and soon made possible a series of movements by which they were soon driven out of that whole region entirely and also from Mombi. It also aroused them to the aid of Ambrose Fuller who had been severely wounded in the battle he had fought last. They therefore transferred him to the far west of Angelinia Agathia appointing general Inner Hylates to succeed him in Mombi.

After the important victory at Caruso & Grove the glandelinians in an endeavor to strike back started an expedition against fort Kingsley and Fort Murseranna. One hundred and twelve warships assisted by gunboats, merrimacs, and rams armed with heavy ten inch guns, and assisted also by submarines and immense fire rafts placed under the command of Admirals Foster and James Gander was arranged. A portion of this fleet which was also protecting all points of Manleys lines by water gathered in force on the Aronburg gun river, October Twelveth a few miles below fortress Kingsley while a large force of glandelinian troops of all sorts commanded by generals Child Stangle, Strangle, and Child Scandle who assisted him, were landed by a long line of hundreds of transports. The fort was armed with two thousand nine hundred and seventeen guns, and was in charge of general Jack Aronburg Aronburg Perishington. Generals Foster and Gander arranged to strike the big fortress Kingsley simultaneously. Part of the immense land force were quickly sent up the opposite side of the stream to make an attempt to capture fort Marcello while the others would make efforts to proceed to gain a point or section between forts Kingsley and Murseranna. Before these troops reached their destination however Foster Berne by a heavy bombardment from his fleet of glandelinian warships compelled the quick surrender of fortress Kingsley after its guns had been silenced and the fortress laid in ruins and all its barracks and camps set on fire. The large garrison had made a gallant and desperate defense but were forced to give in at the end of two daytimes. Fortress Marcello was also captured without a struggle.

indeed by their sagt captures of forts Kingsley and Mare Marcellio on the stretch of the main Aronburgs river the Landelinians indeed had at last gained very formidable and most important pos posts belonging to the Angelinians and it also gave the Landelinian armies and their fleets strong holds upon all the vicinities of fortress Murmerannia and a good position in the rear of Gloriantja on the Mid-Hollesler run. Being forged on by Manley the generals determined to follow up the advantages they had gained by a an attack upon fortress Murmerannia on the right bank of the Aronburgs run, near Dorothy Gale. Two divisions or armies under generals Child sta Strangle,, Child Scangle and Pickadee Powad left fortress Kingsley for fortress Murmerannia on the morninf morning of 16 October the twelfth 1915. Other divisions in charge of general Goodhead were left behind to hold the vanquished forts. Thus Child strangle and his two immense armies arrived in the region of the famous fortress the same evening and went into camp to await the arrival of the fleets. Then upon looking over the situation general Child stan strangle Child Strangle decided finally to send for general Powad and his army of troops.

They arrived at noon on the thirteenth of the same month and Commodore or Admiral Footer and Gander having arrived with their fleets the attack on Port Tumeramnia was soon begun at eight o'clock on the following morning, by all the Glandelinian ships and armed transports all firing upon the water batteries, shore batteries and floating batteries of the Christian in the water. They did little damage despite the fact that the cannonading was most tremendous and the noise deafening and hocking for scores of miles while the Glandelinian fleet received such a tremendous pounding and so many were sunk, with dreadful loss of killed and wounded Glandelinians that Admiral Footer was compelled to withdraw. The stream was fairly clogged with sunken ships and floating wreckage and dead bodies and was a horrible scene indeed. The Admiral was compelled to hasten back to a portion of Manley's rear for repairs for ships damaged of the arrival and to bring up a larger naval force under Izner Myletze. In the meantime after having made twenty desperate assaults by land and having been repulsed with frightful loss every time, General Child Strangle decided to wait. That night the Angelinian generals held a council. The fort was in command of general Perish Portland, assisted by generals Germaine Richardson, and Floyd Stern.

On the suggestion of general Stern it was decided finally as the only way to save the garrison from capture and also the fort to make a desperate sortie the very next morning and rout or destroy the besieging Glandelinian armies, or cut through though through it and escape to Ozma or Dorothy Gale. So at four o'clock in the early morning generals Mic Hardson, Stern, and Allenburger Stanck started out, the former to strike the Glandelinian army on the right under general Richardson Purgatorian and the latter to engage the other wings of the rebels.

Indeed general Richardson's attack was quick and most vigorous and in a short time with their general killed the Glandelinians thus attacked gave way excepting general John Francis's division on the extreme left. This gallant stand with the assistance of light and heavy batteries of artillery of general Mack Brooks, Mic-Alister Mic-Whirther, and Dressed Turn made the Christian line feel recoil horrified over their great losses. But being reinforced it soon resumed the attack and put the whole of the besieging Glandelinian army in peril. General Stranglechild was then called beaching for help and he at once threw his own troops to the front and repelled the Angelinian forces with such fury and persistent effort that after a hard struggle the forces of generals Richardson, and Stern were compelled to fall back to their trenches with their two leaders killed.

During the fierce struggle the attack of the attacking forces the strength of the attacking forces had led two Glandelinian generals to see or fear that the Glandelinian army was liable to be crushed in a short time and fearing the consequences to themselves in case the siege would be broken and the Glandelinian army totally defeated and probably themselves captured they turned over most of their own commands to general Stranglechild and under cover of a smoke fog caused by the tremendous firing of both sides which was so thick objects could not be seen for fifty feet at times as if there was a forest fire, these two generals and a number of their troops cowardly deserted their own companions in arms and fled. One of these generals took a part of his army with him up the river toward Mombi in a small fleet of steamships and transports, while his assistant escaped to his own army under general Washingtonville. Indeed soon after the two commanders who had so acted so cowardly were at once suspended from their respective commands by the government of Glandelinia still in Calvernia.

Indeed sad to say at a very early hour the next morning general Perishington was compelled to request the appointment of commissioners to agree upon terms of surrender. The reply of the rebels was something like general Grants to general Puckner at Fort Donaldson but sterner nevertheless the Federal general of the Angelinians at Port Tumeramnia had to accept to an abrupt unconditional surrender which came speedily. One million one hundred and thirty five thousand men were thus captured, besides three hundred thousand horses mules and cattle, one hundred and forty eight big field pieces, one thousand one hundred and seventy five heavy guns, twenty million muskets, and the most most immense quantity of military stores the enemy had ever yet captured during the war. The loss was estimated at about twenty two thousand two hundred and thirty eight killed and one million wounded on the Angelinian side, and twelve thousand seven twelve thousand four hundred and forty six killed and two million one hundred and seventy five thousand on the Glandelinian side. And the battle only lasted half a day if it say go and get your pay. When general Ambrose Edwin Fuller who lay in a bed wounded at Mombi heard of the fall of the fort he was jubilant while the Christian general Kindernins having also heard of it immediately ordered other generals to make desperate efforts to retake it but fearing danger and disaster general Concentinian Arnburg the wise ordered an immediate evacuation of Chamberlaine and ordered the main troops also from Big Girlknool and Kittenoricherts and to go and retreat toward Dorothy Gale. The big forces of troops therefore in their former places retreated to Dorothy Gale but being rapidly pursued by a part of general E. Perkins army of Scoddlers and Gargoylians, under general Jackson, London they were not able to reach Dorothy Gale and was forced to retreat further northward in another direction. Thus all forts ten miles from Dorothy Gale, and the Girlknools and Kittens Pischerts fell into possession of the wicked Insurgents October twenty sixth. Thus that portion of the region of Dorothy Gale was almost entirely free of all Christian troops.

At the same time however great and stirring events had been occurring on the Angelinian Anline river Mombi and Farewell Island were still occupied by mostly Angelinians who had fled there from the forts having been taken in desperate assaults in which Ambrose Fuller almost got captured before he and his troops were compelled to flee for Manley's lines. These two posts were therefore commanded by general Phedang Phelan Gannon and Gusto Heller also being in charge of general Hindale St. Clare. Thus while Admiral Footer and his aiding admiral had been preparing for a siege and attack of those two Christian forts Kingsley and Tumeramnia general Johnston Vivian dispatched from Kitten Gander by general Shoemanna drove the Angelinians back again from Mombi and the whole stretch of the little Erminie Creek in one of the wildest and most extensive battles in that location raging for two days, and as the defeated Christian forces fled northward and took refuge on Farewell Island on the river that next became the chief object of the next attack of the Glandelinians. This island for many years in possession of Angelinia had been for those years very strongly fortified by the Angelinian government so that when on the morning of October the sixteenth Admiral Footer and Gander with the combined fleets of others and with the aid of generals Izner Myletze and Luis Tumeran opened upon it with heavy guns and mortars no apparent effect was made for a long time, and ships of the Glandelinians were badly damaged and some sunk. However then the rebels began a siege and while the siege was going on general Johnston Vivian at the suggestion of general Izner Myletze had canals and passageways cut from two big bends of the river near two other islands across the neck of a fortified peninsula and bridge work to the vicinity of Mombi where general Johnston Vivian's immense Glandelinian army was encamped. This was made to open passageways for the Glandelinian army of troops and the attacking fleet so that they might flank the Farewell Island and insure its downfall and capture. Six canals had to be made by hundreds of thousands of troops and were about six miles long and was completed after much hard labor and efforts and under heavy fire in twenty seven days. Also while awaiting assistance from general John Vivian Admiral Footer determined to get a much better position so as to give his guns chance for more deadly and effective work. For this purpose an expedition of composed of Scoddlers troops and Scoddlers and Gargoylian marines and bravely supported by the fire of the fleet was sent on November the first to capture seven formidable redoubts on the Erminie Creek shore. This was indeed successful after a tremendous two days battle which field was twenty miles in extent and in which enormous numbers fell on both sides in killed and wounded and on the night of November the third after still harder fighting in a raging rainstorm they took another, but in the engagement generals Josie Gannon, James Gaten, Julio Hellig, James Ball and Jed Jeff of the Glandelinians were killed and general Izner Myletze who led the assaults in person with general Johnston Vivian were severely wounded.

This fourth battle of Mombi had been a tremendous three days deathstruggle but it was a glorious and successful one. At the same time the long line of redoubts at Mombi shore were taken. Admiral Footers fleet attacked down the river firing tremendous broadsides and fired a most tremendous cannonading ten miles in extent from all the many christian batteries on the shore to the assistance of general Johnston. This daring feat though it cost the loss of ten ships was successfully accomplished after three days fierce cannonading and the big fleet of glandelinian ships were recovered with the wildest juzzes by the glandelinian troops now in possession of Mombi again. This passage of the glandelinian fleet and the completion of the mission showed general Shme Shoemannia that the seizure of Farewell Island must soon end in disaster for the christians so he took command in person of Johnston's army which was leaderless and in bringing up his own, immediately pressed the assault. Also realizing that the island would soon fall general Gustor Heller immediately turned over the command of the besieged fortifications to general George Gall, and the troops on the river shores to generals Hindale St. Clare and Phelan Cannon and with a large number of his best soldiers and many officers departed for Dorothy Gale to check the movements of the main Shoemannian goodies and Omani troops through Middle Erminie Junction toward northern Angeline gun and Aronburgs gun. The next day the other three christian generals made fierce attempts to escape from the besieged islands with their troops and artillery. They were stopped by a portion of general Shoemannias forces under general Ball Factor, and cut off from escape by the goodies under general Faine Glass, and Mann Shaggyton and so Farewell Island, with the troops, all the shore batteries, ships and transports and large numbers of artillery and supports on the main land fell into the hands of the wicked insurgents on November the eighth. More than seven million men were surrendered prisoners of war to the wicked Angolinian rebels and among the spoils of victory were 11,432 cannons, and eight hundred centimeter guns and twenty seven mortars, seven million small arms, many thousands of horses, twenty thousand mules, forty four great steamships, large amounts of ammunition and a baggage train of wagons which could have extended for forty miles on a road so many wagons there were. The fall of this stronghold indeed was a most tremendous blow to the Angolinian cause, and as it happened so near Angolinia Agathia it produced wide spread alarm throughout the whole christian world when the news was heard.

It now also seemed very probable that general Shoemannias plan to capture Dorothy Gale and her main defending fortifications would be carried out. General Shoemannia had totally broken the power of the Angolinians in the western section of Angolinia Agathia at the battles of Little Arknool, and then another great glandelinian force had pushed its way up by main force all the way up the Aronburgs gun and Erminie Creek toward Mombi and gained important victories on the right and left bank of both streams not many miles from Dorothy Gale. After the battle of Little Arknool general Shme Shoemannia had marched in a northwesterly direction and encamped near Mombi.

General Shme Shoemannias army at the beginning of the middle of November was encamped between Mombi and the town of St. Ives on the left bank of the main Erminie Creek and close to Jennie's Bridge which crossed the creek near by. General Shoemannias objective point now to attack with the purpose of capture was Dorothy Gale the most important position and encampments near Angolinia Agathia. Its capture would open a direct approach to Angolinia Agathia and the seizure of this fair Angolinian town would give the Angolinian rebels control of all the main great railroad communications between the Aronburgs and Mic-Hollester Run rivers and all the northern parts of Calvernia and Angolinia and the vician key region once more. It would also allow the troops to give material aid to all of general Johnston Manleys fleets and to help Admiral Footers and general gene general Inner Mylete in the plans they were then making to capture Mombi by water and land. So while general Calmanuia Shoemannia was then encamped a large force of over forty four million Abyssinkilians, Abyssinkians and Angolinians, unknown to him or any of his generals had crept up from Ozma town to within a few miles of Mombi and were close to Jennie's Bridge. This force was in command of general Richard Jindernine, and assisted by generals Charles Brown, Jack Evans and John Evans and Picknell.

They however decided to await the arrival of general Bernard Gannin Proville and also general William Mic-Hollester who were also approaching Mombi with a large force from Dorothy Gale before attacking the Shoemannian camp, but learning that general Johnston Manley Manlet was on its way to immediately join general Calmanuia Shoemannia, and knowing that the latter was utterly ignorant of the near presence of his christian enemy it was resolved to strike the glandelinians a telling blow before dawn the following day.

The immense glandelinian armies indeed had been just aroused from slumber on the morning of November the sixth when it was startled by the wild cry of pickets rushing in to the camps with the alarm of the approach of the Abyssinkilians. To make it more startling the animals of the forests such as deer, rabbit, and other game fleeing before the advance of the attackers entered the rebel camps panic stricken.

The violent assault was opened by a furious attack by general Glybourn-Halsted's six divisions on general Mic-Hollester's troops stationed in the woods near Jennie's Bridge. The Angolinians dashed into the camps fighting desperately through it, setting all the tents on fire, blowing up ammunition storehouses, and setting immense cities of army barracks on fire thus filling the region with smoke like a gigantic and extensive forest fire. The glandelinians fought as desperately as they could but the Abyssinkians being fiercer drove the half dressed, and half armed glandelinian troops before them into utmost panic.

General Mic-Hollester's Aberdeen division which was planted across the road, and meadows near Dorothy Gale, was next attacked. The troops were driven into their barrack barracks, and routed out by both cannons and fire, and finally his main line after fighting like demons in the burning camps, and fire set woods for four hours and inflicting wholesale losses on the christians finally gave way before the onslaught and he and all his followers being finally trapped were made prisoners. The Abyssinkilians supported by others pressed on flushed with victory and amid fiery fires started by them in the camps, and amid dreadful losses for both sides a fierce general struggle raged for the distance of twenty miles. For eighteen hours and a half the battle raged, with the glandelinians being steadily pressed back from one work to another teeming with dead and wounded. Terrible was the slaughter on both sides. General Mic-Hollester's Aberdeen of the glandelinians and general Richardson's divisions of the Angolinians being killed. However at length when night set in the whole glandelinian army was pushed back from the Aronburg gun and Erminie Creek rivers in that section for ten miles and the bloodiest day at that section so far was fairly won by the Angolinians. For ten miles from St. Ives toward Mombi, within sight of both Dorothy Gale, and Ozma and even wittens Liecherts could be seen a vast sea of dead and wounded of both sides. Still the glandelinian though driven back held their positions, and during the night were reinforced by the arrival of a portion of Manleys army, and a division under general Lewis Mellenwater.

On the next morning the fight was suddenly renewed with redoubled violence by an attack of general Mellenwater on the main left wing of the Angolinian forces, which was in charge of general Robert Jivian himself, he having come up in the night with extra Angolinian forces to take personal command since the loss of general Jindernine his best friend. The other various glandelinian divisions soon joined in and although the Angolinians fought bravely and most desperately they were soon driven back all the distance they had won on the day before and at length fled in confusion toward Dorothy Gale nine miles away. They lost at least ten million, while the glandelinian loss in killed and wounded and prisoners amounted to 13,000,000.

Soon what was left of general Jindernine's ragged and leaderless army soon afterwards fell back into Dorothy Gale's great mobilization camps and general Calmanuia Shoemannia would have pursued it and in its weak condition probably captured it and moved immediately upon Dorothy Gale had not general Leonia Meldonia Picknell his superior come up just then from Manleys army with his own army and ordered general Shoemannias army to rest itself for a while. This gave the disorganized and beaten christian forces a chance to reorganize and make themselves ready for another desperate battle.

IT was not until a week had at least elapsed after the bloody battle of St Ives that general Shoemannia put his army into motion with the purpose to capture the small outlet stream near Dorothy Gale. He called Grace Darling. He reached the vicinity of that small river junction near the end of the middle of November and at once started work erecting fortifications with the intentions to lay a seige. They were completed within the twenty ninth of November and then arrangements were in edictly made for an attack the very following morning. But during the night the Angelinians had fled for general Robert, Ivin in chag charge had felt that his ore crippled army discouraged by the loss of Indermine was hardly strong enough to cope with the big army of Calmanita Shoemannia and so after destroying everything he and his army could not carry away he took his troops in haste into Dorothy Gale. Arriving there he turned over his command to general Noro, Ivinia and went to see general Hanson Ivin his brother and talk over the desperate situation. General Calmanita Shoemannia took possession of the works at Grace Darling and held it. Indeed the fall of Grace Darling, and of other points already described completed a series of bloody events by which the rebels gained possession of many scores of miles of positions and important points west and south of Dorothy Gale for just before November 17th general Mitchell, Mic-Hollester with part of general Shoemannias army had by rapid marches from Mombi and by a sudden charge on the christian position under Villesash secured control of the Mic-Hollester and Panroa railroad from Angelinia Agathia on the west to Evangeline St Clare in the east and also the Frminia river for about two hundred and fifty miles or more. General Mitchell Mic-Hollester was one of the most daring and audacious of our generals and accomplished most splendid work for the glandelinian cause. It also was this very general who set in motion one of the most remarkable enterprizes undertaken during the seige of Angelinia Agathia.

This was an attempt, indeed a most desperate attempt to destroy the main railroad communications between Angelinia Agathia and Evangeline St Clare. Under his orders general Andrew Sanders with twenty thousand picked goodly glandelinians, disguised as child slave owners, masters and slave drivers advanced to a Mardo junction and took a long train for a very short distance from the station. There they took advantage from the hole sale unloading of soldiers and the like by seizing the train and the remainder as prisoners and throwing the engineers and conductors out as well as the remainder of the passengers dashed with the train up the main road at full speed, and soon by purposely wrecking a part of the train began destruction of the tracks. But it was not long before a train belonging to the Evangeline St Clare and Calverine railroad line was started in swift pursuit of them. One of the most exciting and furious chases of the war started. Onward sped pursuer and pursued. For about two hundred and fifty miles the two trains loaded with soldiers of opposing sides fled at a terrific pace with a number of stops for fuel and the like between. But the fugitive train having to stop now and then to cut telegraph wires, and tear up the tracks or fight plan Angelinian soldiers who tried to capture them the rebel leader and his men began to lose ground, and the pursuers rapidly gained upon them.

At a length again the fuel of the fugitive gave out and the rebels were compelled to leave their train which they set on fire about fifteen miles from Calverine. They fled to the shelter of the woods near Sexton run Creek and defied attack and capture for some time. But the Angelinians all around in that region scouring the country for them with the aid of bloodhounds, and even boy and girl scouts at last discovered them and after a fearful conflict lasting thirty days in the woods from betw een trees and rocks ferreted them out and the whole army which survived the contest was caught. The rebel leader and seventeen of his aids were shot. However this daring raid elicited the approval of the glandelinian war departments and they presented each of the survivors with a gold medal and enough money to prevent them from working for the remainder of their days.

After the capture of Farewell island and the more batteries on opposite sides that defended it, Admiral Footor and Gander started again down the Aronburgs run river with his big warships and long lines of transports containing general Iner Myletse i army in the hope of taking the town of St Anna nearest to Angelinia Agathia by the southward route. He was stopped at about twenty miles above that point by the appearance of a monstrous Angelinian fleet of dreadnaughts under Admiral Zimmerman, and three million troops under general Jeff Beldon from Dorothy Gale, then in command of general Jaser postal io.

Admiral Footor opened upon the christian fleet of battleships at once and engaged the christian fleet in one of the most desperate battles on water or river but unfortunately unassisted by general Myletse troops who after landing on the Angelinia Agathia shore, were prevented by ad from advancing by the storming fire of fortress Petition near Dorothy Gale, was finally compelled to withdraw with great loss in ships and lives. Admiral Zimmerman and Mic-Hollester then reorganized his own fleet of Abbieannian battleships and on November the tenth with the assistance of the heavy guns of fort St Gertrude, attacked the rebel fleet under Admiral footor. He however was repulsed with the loss of eighteen warships and sixty thousand men in killed wounded or drowned, and as the rebel admiral was unable to follow up his victory, the opposing fleets stood quiet for several weeks. Then the Angelinians learning of the loss of Mombi, Kittens, Roberts, Big and Little Girl knolls and Grace Dari parling hurried down to St Anna.

Admiral footor and Iner Myletse were now reinforced by ram and merrimacs and gun boat squadrons as well as torpedo boats and subma submarines sent by general Charles Sanderton and on the middle of the third week of the month he reattacked the Angelinian squadrons in front of St Anna. It was a desperate conflict but the christian fleet being overwhelmed was routed and this being disposed of, glandelinian glandelinian troops under general Wallis grantlin took possession of the town.

A short time before these events just recorded general Mic-Hollester, Helder, and Comodore Failenton set out to follow up the earlier capture of Mombi and vicinity by other important movements on the northern shore of Mic-Hollester run river. On October the twelfth, they reached the little gunbeam river, and the next morning fifteen million troops separated into three immense divisions under generals poster Mic-Cook, Reno, Antonio Mic-Whirther and Park Maulen were landed in a few days time and marched against a strongly entrenched christian position under general great Harting at Newgaler. On the morning of the fourteenth of October the desperate attack was made, and although for two days the Angelinians held out desperately, bravely and persistently, and destroyed many brigades of the assailants and two of their generals mentioned of the latter, they were at length overcome by overwhelming numbers and being attacked in flank and hard pressed and their main leader killed and ten others wounded all being general la, the army finally fled across the stream. By burning many bridges behind them, and by their battering the shores the army managed to escape. The glandelinians exultant over their victory then took possession of north Galer.

This was followed on October the twenty second by the capture of positions near port St Peter on a point of sandmans island near the entrance of Dorothy Gale harbor and by the accession of other important points on the river coast.

Early during the beginning of the siege of Angelina Agathia in the early fourth year of the war and up to now general Meldorf Bell in command of one of general Hanleys main batteries began preparations for the bombardment of the main fortified works and some of the fortifications of his fortress burned. Batteries of big contomater guns, krupp guns, rifled guns and became heavy cannons and others were planted on all captured point of the river near the fortress south on one of porothy Gale near where the great fortress stood. Then the Angelina gun river in the ear of the fort or where it made a bend was effectively closed closed by the erection of six heavy floating batteries at St vincent's point, on St Michael's island, and a number of batteries on other near islands and on the opposite shores. Before the attack on Fortress Burns was made however general Meldorf Bell was succeeded by general Edwin Gunter. The attack and siege of the great fortress opened on October the tenth, by a heavy earthshaking commanding from all points under the direction of generals Gilmore, Turner, John Anderton, and Gunter. For twenty two days the fortress was well defended. The cannonading of thousands of big guns was tremendous but the balls and shelled soon played such havoc with the walls of the fort, and blown down its outer works, and set so many big fires that the immense garrison was obliged to surrender before land attacks had been made. The gain of this important position made it possible for the Glandelinians to close all ports of porothy Gale and Angelina Agathia against the numerous Angelinian blockade runners that were so often making much mischief to Hanley along the three river coasts. Meanwhile Commodore James Dargor then in command of the navy of the southern rebel river coast line of defense with the assistance of general Wilber Modro had captured Fort Marie, on Maria Island, and compelled the Angelinians to finally abandon their other fortresses along the east coast of the Angelina gun as far up as Evangelina St Clare. Rosa was captured November fifth by a rebel fleet of ships and a body of troops under general Earnest Ball, and St Augustine A Island was taken possession of by the Glandelinians or Commodore Mandon Wedger. This alarmed the Angelinians and they at once fled from the region and all their outer fortifications on the main opposite fort Pettition.

In order to make the attempt to gain possession of porothy Gale the main strong hold guarding Angelina Agathia, and also to gain possession of other points the main head of the besieging Glandelinian army finally placed general Izner Myletze in full command of the expedition and dired directed him to cooperate with the remainder of the Glandelinian navy there in an effort to capture those most important places. Glorinia being now the chief object of this new and desperate operation and expedition it was arranged to have all the land and naval forces of the being besieging armies near Mombi gather for the move. So when general Izner Myletze arrived at that important point with about fourteen million troops from the point of Angelina Gardner, he found there general Earnest Ball with Zimmermanian and Mic-Hellestinian troops, Admiral Footer with a large naval force, and a fleet of battleships and submarines commanded also by admiral Gander. He also found every passageway to Glorinia well guarded. Twenty two fortifications stood on the bend of the Angelina River, seventeen miles from porothy Gale and the town of Glorinia, and a number of smaller fortifications were above these, and obstre obstructions of strong material had been placed in the river below while a portion of general Francis Vivian's immense army guarded the city on the land side. General Izner Myletze at once had a conference with his under generals and the admirals and they all agreed upon a tremendous plan for the capture of Glorinia which had defied capture before for nearly four years. It was arranged that first a great attack would be made on all the big forts below by Ganders ships. Then if this failed footer was if possible to take his own and stronger stronger vessels or dreadnaughts past the forts, cut off all their supplies and supports, and attack the Angelinian ships up the river. General Izner Myletze was then to attempt the capture of one fort after another by assaults in the rear with his big army of troops. Then both the land and naval forces could press on to Glorinia and fiercely engage Vivian's army by both river and land at the same time. So according to this desperate plan the two immense fleets in which were there were forty seven hundred battleships, submarines, rams and gunboats and a long line of thousands of transports bearing troops, proceeded up the river in double rank. Admiral Ganders big ships which led the procession managed to get good positions near the dangerous forts by assuming disguise in the fact that they really had possession of many Angelinian warships. The obstructions had in the meantime been swept away by the rebels purposely swelling the river at that point by raking and bursting secret dams. A tremendous volley of shots from fort Coccolia opened the battle on the morning of November the eighteenth. Ganders long line of battleships supported by the gunboats and submerines and other ships responded, and there was a most severe artillery duel for almost twenty four days. But Admiral Footer soon saw that he or his followers were not at all able to silence the christian or Federal enemy and so having read of Ferragut's expedition against New Orleans in the American civil war he decided to attempt the same thing here, to run by the christian forts, and to do it at night. The perilous voyage was started at night in the evening the ships of General Gander covering the movements of the main fleet. One section of the immense rebel fleet sailed up the east bank of the immense river to attack the forts on that side, while the rest commanded by Footer kept the western bank to look after the thundering fortifications there. The dark night was lighted up by the rapid flashes from the many guns of the forts, and from the Angelinian Angelinian shore batteries, and from the contending ships, and from many blazing fire rafts sent down to oppose them by the Angelinians. The scene was a grand one, almost like the bombardments of Iwian-ickey, and the noise was most terrific. Twenty thousand big guns on the shore, and thirty thousand two hundred and six guns of all kinds from the forts bellowed forth their deafening thunder against the six thousand guns of the two attacking fleets, and these with the incessant explosion of shells and high explosives made the earth tremble like an earthquake.

Despite the awful hammering of so many christian guns the immense fleets of Glandelinian ships passed the two lines of forts without a single ship being lost, but one of the fleets happened to be attacked by an Angelinian fleet of dreadnaughts, rams and gunboats and sixteen floating batteries. But the contest was short for in the battle the Angelinian fleet was destroyed within the space of a day. This great victory cost the Glandelinians the loss of thirty thousand men killed however, and one hundred and twenty five thousand wounded. In the meantime Izner Myletze had landed his immense army and compelled the surrender of the forts one after another by attacking and bombarding in the rear, and then after a tremendous battle on land fearfully defeated general Vivian's army with the loss of nearly one million men. Then Footer and Gander with their fleet steamed up to Glorinia. Millions of the people in the city saying there because they had thought it was safe from capture since it resisted so successfully so long before now were panic stricken and thousands of houses were immediately set on fire and great conflagrations raged. Millions of dollars worth of provisions was hurriedly carried to the levees of the river to be set on fire, and spices and other goods worth forty four million dollars was sent out of the city of Glorinia by railroad, and hundreds of thousands of men women and children taking what they could wit them fled from the doomed town toward porothy Gale and Ozma. As general Footer approached on November the twenty fifth general Love Friend of the christians finally set fire to his camp and immense stores of provisions, and another portion of the city, and quickly decamped after skirmishing with the rebels. Footer then held the city of Glorinia until general Izner Myletze arrived with his immense army of victorious troops and took formal possession. Izner Myletze made his headquarters at St Charles catholic School and at once proclaimed martial law throughout the city.

And indeed his rigorous rule over Glorinia excited a most violent personal hatred of the general by the people who had been forced to remain in the city. At the same time he or proving himself to be a dangerous general to the Angelinians elsewhere a great reward of 10,000,000 dollars was offered for general Calamania Shoemann's capture and delivery dead or alive, to any Angelinian authority or man who succeeded.

General Hanson Vivian himself announced a proclamation in which he pronounced general S. Highman Shoemann to be a Glandelinian felon deserving of any kind of capital punishment and that he should never be treated as a public rebel enemy of the Angelinian cause but as an outlaw and common enemy of all woman and man kind and of all child children, and also general Hanson ordered that in the event of the capture of the Glandelinian general, the officer in command of the Angolinian force that had captured him to cause him to be immediately executed by shooting. The main grand Glandelinian army of the enemy under general Leonia Maldonia Picknell during the other various engagements lay mainly idle for sometime in the vicinity of Ozma town awaiting orders to advance. It had however been reinforced and disciplined from time to time so that early in September it comprised a strong Glandelinian force of nearly ninety two million men. The many under generals serving in his command had at last become very impatient for his and their armies of troops to do something to help crush the Angolinian cause with the capture of Angelina Agathia. So general Manley on the twenty seventh of September issued a general order directing a most general and simultaneous general movement of all of his land and naval forces besieging Angelina Agathia against the Angolinians, and to be executed on October the first. General Picknell was then fully ordered to march his main armies against all points of Ozma town and also against Ozma. The general in chief however remonstrated with wildy against this, and proposed to take his army to support Shoemanna who was planning to assault the outposts of Porothy Gale and to move his army by way of the two rivers. General Johnston Jackson Manley did not agree to this and so it was decided to submit the matters to a big council of many generals, when general Picknell's plan was finally accepted.

Then general Picknell thought of level best to wait until the few forces under Shoemanna had gained victories before starting for Porothy Gale. Then learning that the Angolinians had finally defeated from Mombi and Richerts toward Porothy Gale, general Picknell took his whole Glandelinian army across the Evangeline St. Lawrence river and advanced toward abandoned Kittens Richerts to give general Galsman in and his assistance supports.

At about this time a long, decisive and sharp battle occurred in the river of Angeline run between two fleets of Angolinian ships and a fleet of Glandelinian ships. The Glandelinian fleet having believed it would have a chance to start on a trip of destruction among the shore batteries of the Christians and the fleets covered by it moved forward and encountered a fleet of ships belonging to Zimmerman's main squadron. After a sharp fight the rebel fleet managed to destroy six ships and sink or disable three others. This disaster spread alarm among the army and navy officers in possession of camp near Ozma as they feared other Christian fleets and war ships would soon share the fate of the former fleet. They felt sure they could devise no means to prevent the impending disaster. But relief came to them unexpectedly in the shape of Zimmerman's main fleet approaching to engage the rebel fleet. There was a terrific conflict lasting three hours both fleets hurling huge balls and shells at each other with destructive and tremendous force. Many ships of both sides were badly shattered and some sunk but the rebel fleet suffered so much that that it was obliged to give up the fray and flee to Manley's protecting shore batteries on both parts of his main army situated on both sides of the river.

Both the commanders of the opposing fleets were wounded, Admiral Zimmerman being struck in the head by a fragment of a shell. This same Glandelinian fleet never ventured out again.

On the meantime when the Angolinians had evacuated Kittens Richerts general Richard Picknell had with his retreating forces taken up to a position near a small outlet of the river called Glandelinia horn in the Aronburgs gun valley. General Manley Henson then in command of the vast army of Glandelinian troops near Gertrude's Ferry wishing to secure control of the region dispatched general Shielder Maldonia to attack the Christian general Picknell. The latter with his army of Abyssinkilians and Angolinians withdrew further up, and Shielders after pursuing him for some short distance, encamped at Glandelinia horn. General Picknell then being reinforced from an army sent from Porothy Gale came down the small valley with a large army of troops, infantry and cavalry and attacked Shielders at Glandelinia horn just southeast of Porothy Gale about ten miles. After a very severe engagement in which Shielders and Picknell of each side were badly wounded, the Angolinians were defeated. The Angolinians were compelled to flee up the small valley with the main Glandelinian army under general Ma Manley Henson close on their heels.

The main army of general Leonia Maldonia Picknell began its movement on the main planket Bay Peninsula early in October. All but about seventy three million of that army, which were left for the protection of Mombi had been transferred to the girlknobs and Kittens Richerts by general Picknell. There were now immense armies in four or six sections of about one hundred and twenty one million men and these were soon moved in two immense columns up the strange and famous Peninsula, one column under general Josephine Jensen, marching near the Erminia run, and the other under general Adela-De-Garbe near the Aronburgs Run river near its north end. A fortified line of works had in the meantime been formed across the Peninsula by a large Christian force under general J.B. Mic-Holleston.

Being deceived as to the number of the Angolinian forces general Leonia Maldonia Picknell decided he could not get beyond the Erminia run without making a desperate attack, but as Manley had not ordered him to do so he waited for orders, while a regular siege of Maldonia was begun by general the rebel general Madelon Evans, although in this location the Glandelinians were twenty times stronger in number than the Angolinians were themselves. After a desperate attempt to capture the intrenchments on the little Mildred Creek by a Glandelinian division under general Hardise in the life of Adela-De-Garbe division had failed, general Accountants here also fell back to the stronger intrenchments in front of a smaller stream called Tea Kettle Run. He was pursued by the Christian armies under general Summer Mac-Gabe and the main army of the Angolinians, while general Richard John Kindermine, the famous Kindermine he served so long in the war and who lost his brother remained at Gloriana and sent troops under general Franklin Picknow to strike the enemy on the left wing. General Picknell himself now made his sudden appearance and assumed chief command of the Glandelinians. He soon withdrew his main army and fell back toward Mombi with the intention of concentrating a stronger position near Jennie's Bridge and Phelanton, leaving the remainder to hold Tea Kettle Run. On his retreat however he was apprised by a tremendous and most desperate attack on November the fifth by generals Aberdeen Mic-Whirther, Kearney Bernarl, and Phaul Cannonin. A most severe battle followed and gradually extended for seventeen miles. Aberdeen Mic-Whirther led the main and first assault and kept it up for fully nineteen hours, when other divisions of troops under thirtythree generals and hundreds of other officers came to his aid and general Maurice Glance with a division of Abyssinkilians turned the flank of the rebels. This drove the Glandelinians into a precipitous rout leaving about nearly eighty thousand of their dead and wounded behind them.

The Angolinians flushed by this sudden victory and fortune to turn of affairs would have pursued the fugitives and probably captured or dispersed the whole army but general Kindermine came on the battlefield just then and knowing the strength of the enemy and the danger of pressing on without the main support of Concentinian Arc Aronburg did not allow it, however he did move his army forward slowly until Picknell was safe near the town of Mombi.

On the battle of Tea Kettle Run the Glandelinians lost about two million two hundred thousand men, and the Angolinians only six hundred thousand one hundred. Since the beginning of the campaign general Picknell himself before his defeat at Tea Kettle Run had only moved thirty six miles toward Angelina Agathia during the two weeks after Manley's arrival there. The principal reason given for this slow progress was that he had been so fiercely opposed and had been so often engaged in many skirmishes and small battles that he had from his severe losses not enough men to defeat the opposing Angolinians. His army had been somewhat depleted by the loss of general Isaac Brooks division withdrawn from his army to go to the aid of Shoemanna and strengthen his post, and of general Break in the Necke corps who had been ordered to a position where they could be ready to assist in the defense of Mombi in case general Hanson's army would mass his whole army against that point, or in a general attack upon Porothy Gale. In addition to these losses and withdrawals, general Concentinian convention with his ten million men at Kittens Richerts had been for some reasons or other made independent of Picknell's orders by general Manley.

Despite the fact that picknell felt sure he could not absolutely do anything with the necessary support of the main troops left scattered at various points he had nevertheless engaged the christians fiercely at Ten Kettle run and after his defeat kept complaining to general Hanley of a want of men and provisions declaring that the enemy at his front was too strong. In the meantime general Convention feeling certain that the Angelinians could easily be driven out of Gloriana started from his own encampments near Mombi and made a personal reconnaissance. Then he crossed the small stream of Mildred and landing a few brigades for the purpose of striking the rear of the fortifications below that point, but upon reaching the point he found that general Frank Lansen of the Abyssinkilians in command of the positions at Little Mildred Creek had already retreated, and a Convention gained the works without a fight on October the ninth. Before leaving the region here the Angelinians set fire to a once powerful wooden warships and the rest of the Angelinian warships and some transports in the Mic-Hollester Run river set off for Angelinia. Agathia hotly pursued by Admiral porters fleet to within eight miles of Angelinia Agathia where one section of the strong Mic-Hollester Dolarine portresses on Evangelina St. Clara bluff and strong obstructions in the river put an end to the chase. After general Agathia had withdrawn his troops from the works near portress general Raymond Federalton with thirty million glandelinians took up a position near that works ready for any coming emergency. General Agathia was then moving northward toward Dorothy Gale. At the beginning of October therefore general Emory Page and Look the Cook who had joined general Federalton near Mombi were ordered to hold general Agathia from escaping to Dorothy Gale with his army, while general Robert E. Robert E. Mic-Hollester should push across the Aronburgs Run and cut off all usual communications between Angelinia Agathia and Ozma. While on the way to join the christian of Agathia's command one of general More Agathia's army corps under general Francis Gratin, fell in with the glandelinian troops under general Look the Cook. The latter moved against the christian force, and at upon Mac-Farren Crossroads, two miles west or south west of Gloriana a severe battle of about three days took place. Although neither side could have declared itself to be the victor the Angelinians nevertheless retreated. In this battle the glandelinians lost in killed and wounded two hundred and fifty six thousand men, and the Angelinian glandelinians themselves lost four hundred and ad and sixty thousand men. Simultaneously to this some stirring events occurred elsewhere. General Miller pressed back general Hermin Evans of a christian Abyssinkilian division to Turner Crossroads and a few days later the combined forces of Federalton and other rebel leaders capt captured and despoiled a large christian force under general royal near Balt and Baltimore. When general Evans retreated quickly toward Dorothy Gale, pursued by nearly twenty million glandelinians for seventeen miles. Arriving at Alton Gainer he finally made a stand, with seven million men against an attack by Pemberton federal who assumed command of the twenty million glandelinians in person here. After fighting gallantly for several days these Angelinian forces were compelled to retreat because of the approach of Federalton with an overwhelming force of Goodler glandelinians. The Angelinians were pursued as far as Dorothy Gale or six miles of her and they an encamped there in the safety of the strong camps. Learning of these movements general John Lindernine sent a big force toward the southeast over the wooded country to intercept the glandelinian army should they not start a retreat toward Mombi, and the christian general picknell hurried on front the west toward Little Mildred creek, with the same object in view. At this both federal and Federalton moved with his whole their whole force toward Mombi and the Angelinians gave chase. Picknell then took the glandelinians a part of the main army under general William M. Hopkins at Lording Crossroad a little beyond Mildred Creek on November the seventh. The struggle that followed was a sharp and severe one but with no results. At the same time Angelinian troops under generals Carrol Gall, and Wilor Howards were pressing general Pemberton federal at Port Gale beyond the Mildred Maxwell Junction so closely that he called upon general Federalton for help.

The glandelinian general set out at once to obey the call and by burning the bridges over the little Mildred Creek stopped the pursuit of the Angelinian forces. General Pemberton federal then with his large force of goodlers easily routed his enemies, and they finally fell back to Dorothy Gale.

In the meantime by the middle of October general Lucia Haldon picknell with his glandelinians managed to get within nine miles of Dorothy Gale making his headquarters at Pencil town near the east end of the Aronburgs Run river and soon the two armies of Concentinian Aronburg and picknell confronted each other upon opposing sides of the Aronburgs Run. Nothing then was done for a few days as both generals were awaiting the promised reinforcements both from general Agathia, and from Hanley. The close proximity the nearness of the glandelinian armies alarmed the Angelinian governments of Dorothy Gale and immense preparations were made by the population and the government authorities for a hasty flight if it into Dorothy Gale if necessary. The Angelinian armies in the region even covered the railroad tracks of scores of railroad lines leading out of the various towns and cities around Angelinia Agathia with everything possible so that the flight of artillery could be easily made, and also trains of cars were held in constant readiness for the retreat of the Agathians and their staff generals.

Indeed all these preparations called forth from all no authorities of Dorothy Gale immense resolutions demanding the defense of Dorothy Gale and her outskirts at all human hazards, and naming the Agathian generals and their high staff commanders that whatever destruction or loss of city and military property that shall soon result would be cheerfully submitted to to avoid capture by the enemy.

On November the twenty third for large portions of the contentinian armies finally came together at Jennie's Bridge and had a sharp and severe but undecisive battle, and retreated toward Mildred Creek where on the following day they fought desperately again. When the glandelinians were fortunately driven back and the Angelinians finally took possession again of Little Mildred Creek. Seeing the result of this blood shed and two conflicts in two days and realizing that the army was in peril from the two defeats, general picknell ordered an immediate advance while general Adele-De-Garbo was sent with his force toward Mombi to reinforce the troops there and to keep the way open for general Federalton and Pemberton to rejoin the army, which picknell for need of persistently demanded.

These two latter rebel general succeeded in cutting all communications with Angelinia Agathia at last except one leading toward Calverline, and then rejoined the main picknellian army. The apparent defeat as it seemed of general picknell emboldened emboldened general Agathia who had joined Concentinian Aronburg to move his own forces out from his entrenchments and attacked the main glandelinian forces on the Mombi side of Mildred Creek. General James Langston led the desperate assault and fell suddenly and most vigorously upon the glandelinian army under general Adele-De-Garbo who held a strong position on both sides of the Mic-Hollester and Panron railroad tracks, half a mile beyond Mildred Creek.

General Adele-De-Garbo made a most brave stand but his command was soon disabled and he was compelled to fall back before the pressure of the christian assault. Immense bodies of troops then were at once sent to his aid by general Jesipine Jensen and Brankin the Neck but the assault of the opposing christian forces were so strong and irresistible, the whole body of glandelinians gave way and retreated to Mildred Maxwell Railroad station, on the Mic-Hollester and Panron Pandora railroad station where reinforcements were received from generals Killstone and Strangelohld but as the Angelinian forces also gained fresh troops and were supported by a tremendous artillery fire of heavy guns and machine guns, the unfortunate glandelinians were worse off than before, and it looked like a sweeping victory for the Angelinians at last. But just then general Mic-Hollester Len Lenord and Gusbaum Mic-Whirther seeing the peril of his friend picknell hurried to the scene of action with the divisions of generals Sedwicker and Frank Hanson pommer.

The tremendous battle then raged with redoubled violence and continued more furiously than ever before and continued until full night fall, when a tremendous bayonet charge by the glandelinians supported by a headlong onslaught of a monstrous cavalry column of all varieties of Gargoylians and Scodler troopers finally broke the opposing christian line all to pieces and stopped the fighting for the night. On the next morning the battle was renewed with awful ferocity and continued all day long with many varying fortunes on both sides when defeated the Angolinians withdrew to porothy Gale once more. The losses of the Angolinians amounted to seven million. The glandelinian loss was twelve million five hundred thousand. Among the severely wounded, was general Francis yiviananna of the Angolinians and general Ben Logan Malton. In the night of the glandelinian side. The latter received a severe wound on his left arm and was not able to continue command. After the bloody two days battle of Mildred Crossing the army of General Maldonic picknell withdrew to porothy Gale once more.

While these preparations were being made a body of one hundred and fifty thousand glandelinian cavalry men all fierce scodler Gargoylians under general Kniffmann Sterling started out on one of the most daring raids of the war. At the beginning of the raid, he was killed during a skirmish with the Angolinians and general James Johnston took his place and carried on the raid with a success. A body of army rose all around the Jameson Christian Army, seized and burned one thousand one hundred and fourteen wagons, and thirty six transport ships laden with stores and provisions on the Little Sun River and carried away sixty five thousand prisoners and two hundred and sixty five thousand mules and many horses.

General Kniffmann Sterling if you please to introduce him completed his main preparations, by November the twenty sixth if there is such a month, when he sent general Raymond Richardson Federal with a very large force from Nambi Junction on the main Erminia Creek to turn the main right wing of the Jameson Christian Army and fall upon their full base of supplies at the junction of Turners Creek no named because it joined the Erminia right at that spot. Another and more heavier force under general Maldonic convention, and accountants and others besides Huebner who-whither and others crossed the river near the town of Beppe Lamin about the same time and made an attack upon general yiviananna's right wing commanded by general Henry Randall, at a place called Mays Hill. The battle here was one of the first severe near porothy Gale and resulted in the defeat of the glandelinians with a loss of more than thirty three million men in killed wounded and prisoners and a hundred generals dead or wounded including Federal himself who was wounded in the right leg. It was a wild conflict of one day's duration. yiviananna who commanded the army though wounded himself in the other battle lost about six million four hundred thousand in killed and wounded. Indeed had this victory been immediately followed up by a movement on Nambi that ten night have been immediately taken that night from the defeated insurgents, but by the way the enemy had been getting a. all day long during the frightful battle of Beppe Lamin general yiviananna feared that his vast army and all his stores and camps were in great peril from Adelaide-Garbe and a prepared to transfer both to the Aronburgs gun river for better safety. This movement was begun on November the twenty seventh. The stores at Mildred Creek were to be moved under the protection of general a Charles Browns troops which was also ordered to attend to carrying away some of the best batteries of guns and covering the army on its retreat for the Aronburgs gun river. So when for this purpose the troops were arranged on a long stretch of rising ground near a point called Childs Dale or Childs pale as the matter may be on the shape of a long angle between Nambi and Rosa they were suddenly and violently attacked by a very large force of glandelinian Scodlers under under general Leo postellio and Buster Henryson. Another most severe and anguished conflict took place and extended for twelve miles. General yiviananna was soon hard pressed and his right wing shattered by losses, and indeed was so hard pressed by the attack, and so heavily cannonaded by Leo postellio's batteries of siege guns that he had to send to general yiviananna who was on the opposite side of the Aronburgs gun river for reinforcements. General Arc his pence division of general Henry Phelan's corps, was sent over immediately to stop the wild glandelinian assault but the attack was pressed by overwhelming numbers and these reinforcements though trying desperately to hold its ground was found to be insufficient, and therefore the many brigades of general picknell picknell and Hobart gowen were hurried across the river. Indeed they arrived just in time to rally the shattered army of general yiviananna which was falling back from its positions in confusion and disorder. They were therefore reorganized and rallied and the whole new line of battle being formed the glandelinians met terrific resistance, and soon the army of Scodlers were driven from the field. At this battle of Childs Dale the Angolinians lost about eight million in killed and wounded, and the glandelinians about five million. That night general yiviananna withdrew to the left side of the Aronburgs gun, and destroyed all the bridges behind him and set a portion of the stores and abandoned equipments and army barracks on fire. On account of this severe engagement and of the constant repulses of general Adelaide-Garbe's army, Shoemanna Shoemanna became alarmed and started to seek a new position. So early on the morning of October 5 or 6, November the twenty eighth his army started on a march to Beldons Bend of the same river with the purpose to support Adelaide-Garbe. In the procession was a long train of nearly five million five hundred thousand wagons laden with ammunition, stores and baggage, and a drove of about twenty two thousand seven hundred twenty two thousand five hundred and sixty head of beef and other cattle. General yiviananna did not learn of this suspicious movement of Shoemanna changing his position and looking for a new position until the army was far on its way toward the new position on the Erminia Creek. He then determined to pursue and overtake and destroy if possible the retreating glandelinian army under Shoemanna himself.

General Shoemanna's rear guard was composed of the glandelinian divisions of general Keffer Little, Katze, Adde, Keen, and Kenna Gray, and these had just reached the small outskirts of Angolinia. Gertrude Angeline called the town of Gertrude Angeline when Keffer Little was attacked by a Jameson Christian force under general Jennings Donald Hanson and general Daniel Jones and Ben Logan, which had been sent out by general yiviananna. In the battle that followed the christian attackers were repulsed by general James Lockvans ten brigades under ten other generals, supported by the Scodlers and Mic-Hollesstinians under general Black Brooks and Junjun nap. At night the glandelinians fell back swiftly back to the town of Gandanton ten miles nor south of porothy Gale, leaving about two million five hundred thousand of their wounded at Gertrude Angeline in the possession of the Angolinians. The entire army of Shoemanna managed to pass the region of Gertrude Angeline the next morning before daylight. While general James Mic-Glade with a rear guard of Mic-Hollesstinians was protecting the passage of the main Jennie's Bridge two miles north west of Nambi and covering the withdrawal of the wagon trains from that point on November the 30th, the main column of Angolinian pursuers came up and engaged him in a most severe contest lasting nearly all day long. After very hard and stubborn fighting general Mic-Glade managed to keep the wild Angelinian attackers back until the approach of nightfall, when the glandelinians destroyed all the bridges and finally withdrew. On the same morning suddenly to say the glandelinian troops elsewhere of the same army were attacked by yiviananna and Robert yivian and Kindernine, with the support of the armies of Harlan Brown, the other Richardson Halsted, Greatheart, and Ben Logan near by at Elia Canis. It was a most sanguinary battle of terrible and savage description, and resulted in a victory for the glandelinians at all points after fresh troops under Adelaide-Garbe, Federal and Shoemanna and Convention had arrived to their assistance. In the conflict general Ah Anna was who led the Scodler troops in a counter charge against the attacking Angolinians was captured, and general Shoemanna himself received a severe wound.

The next day December 1st the whole ragged army of Shoemannians had gained a very strong and reliable position very close to Mombi within the reach of the glandelinian marchers and other craft on the Erminie Creek or river. Not being satisfied with the present position and wishing to extend it as far as possible general plank Brooks who succeeded Shoemannia for the time being went down to interview general Adela-De-Garbo with the purpose to find what to do next on the situation. While he was gone at Adela-De-Garbo's headquarters at Ghild, where junction his army was fiercely attacked on gladder Crossroads near von Mombi. The Angellians moved onward from Eli Gumbi in a strong steady line of battle, and charged furiously upon the glandelinian positions in an endeavor it to capture or carry it by storm and capture great. The Angellians attacked in thirty strong columns each separated from the other making as many gigantic onslaughts one after the other but the glandelinians though driven from the positions twice regained them and bravely met the other fierce onslaughts, and one of the most terrible battles of the war began. In the thickest of the fierce fight were the main troops of Adela-De-Garbo, Junger camp, plank Brooks, Kenneth Gray, until toward the approach of evening, when Raymond Richardson Federal brought fresh troops of soldiers to their aid. The battle ships on the river also did very effective work with well directed bombshells. At last at eight o'clock in the evening the Angellians were driven away with great loss and took shelter in the woods. As in old Adela-De-Garbo's former losses and the wounding of more of his counsels, accountants and plank Brooks prevent the capture of porothy Gale. The victory of the glandelinians at gladder Crossroads was indeed no decisive the generals of his army felt sure he would have pursued general Vivian and general Vivian shattered forces in the very morning, and within twenty four hours more march into the an encampment of porothy Gale and the city itself. But no, Adela-De-Garbo's army was too shattered, and though he did not like to do so general Manley sent a swift messenger sent to his ordered Adela-De-Garbo to fall back to Mombi and Glinda leading the spot he formerly had selected as a most secure place for his supplies and soldiers.

Thus ended for a time a desperate assault on porothy Gale which had been little but a series of bloody and crushing failures. General Adela-De-Garbo's retreat indeed satisfied the authorities at porothy Gale that no further attempts to take the city would be made at that time, so they ordered general Vivian to push on to Mombi and make an effort to recapture it.

General Shoemannia who was wounded had been removed to Mombi and was at this time lying in a bed in one of the important rooms of a mansion, and his leaderless army now under general Federal was comprised of sixteen corps divisions, and commanders under three main generals Bob, Inderwile, Buster Phelan, and Puddle Ishter. After retreating general Adela-De-Garbo's main army was now near Mombi when general Vivian by Robert Vivian's order left Mildred Creek and crossing the Erminie at a Ford came upon general Richardson Federal at a new position near Maldon River harbor a few miles west of Mombi. A most terrible struggle, which most of the time was carried on with infantry charges, hand to hand struggles, and artillery duels of wild and great intensity took place. General Federal although assisted by general generals, Richard Tamerline, P Thomas Tamerline and Federal Johnston and others after all day of hard fighting was being rapidly pushed back with one of his wings crushed, when the arrival of the divisions under general Junger camp and Glinda Benligan of Shoemannian's army saved the day. The Angellians were defeated with an equal loss of two million in killed and wounded. General Federal managed to keep his position in this location, for three days when he fell back behind the Aronburg gun. General Vivian in the meantime had now concentrated his main force for the march on Mombi. They pushed forward in most heavy columns many miles long. Finding after desperate fighting that they could not force a passage of the Erminie River a portion of the army was therefore sent on a circuitous route to flank the glandelinians.

general Alfred Costello, leading this I I manna Christian Christian Finn King force crossed the river on the twenty fifth of November. He quickly marched over the main Erminie Creek near the Angellian Aronburg Thoroughfare gap and at the breaking of day the very next morning morning if you please to mention he had reached a little stream which joined at the mouth of the Suni gunbeam gun and which was called Gunmerania junction two miles east of Mombi. There he was soon joined by the army of general Moro Vivian. General Adela-De-Garbo with his whole army of Shoemannians and Goodlers, excepting general Raymond Richardson Federal's main divisions then gave battle to the combined Christian Christian forces at Gunmerania Junction not far from the old time battle ground of Mombi fought between general Robert Vivian and his son General Vivian. It was a terrible struggle lasting all day long without any respite on both sides and indeed after a loss of about seven million men on each side the contest ended without any decisive result. General Adela-De-Garbo not discouraged resolved to renew the big battle the next morning, so he was expecting help from general Raymond Richardson Federal, who had an order from general Johnston Jackson Manley brought his main army close to Mombi. But being watched too closely by the main army of Glandelinian Aronburg near by Federal was not able to advance to Adela-De-Garbo any supports whatever whatever and on the next day Adela-De-Garbo had to go it alone with the mere few men with a few Angellian and Angellian forces.

The glandelinians then on this time assaulted the Angellians most fiercely and made most sanguinary conflict of terrible ferocity was the result. The whole of Adela-De-Garbo's army was badly defeated with his army shattered and disabled and were sent flying across the Erminie Creek to Mombi where they were reinforced by general Federal and by the Shoemannian troops of general Franklin Bridge and Picknell.

There the glandelinian army made a rally and then followed it with a most desperate stand, and Federal not daring to attack the Angellian forces sent the goodlers under Adela-De-Garbo on a flank movement. The latter unfortunately came upon the Angellian forces under general Phillip Phelan at Aronia north of Mombi on the same afternoon and a most terrible conflict was fought for all the rest of the day in a cold rain and at snow on a mountain. It was the severest conflict of the battle or of Gunmerania Junction and in it the two Christian generals mentioned were killed and general Raymond Richardson Federal and Adela-De-Garbo were wounded. When the night fell the glandelinians at Aronia still held the bloody battle field but by their tremendous losses they were terribly broken and disorganized and soon fled to the shelter of the earthwork fortifications of Mombi. Being wounded but not severely general Adela-De-Garbo on his own request, was now sent northwest to eastern Galverinia to take personal command of a glandelinian army there and with the purpose to support general John Manley who was making a campaign.

At this time throughout the whole of Angellia and Abissinia seeing how Angellia Angellia Agathia was threatened and how the war was progressing in Galverinia another call for an immense number of volunteers to serve during the war, was at once given Vivian's demand made by the authorities all through the Angellian states there being a call for over three hundred million men of all ages, but the order was also that a great number would be drafted from the citizens throughout the Angellian nation who were between eight eighteen and forty five or even older if they did not appear among the volunteers. Indeed a more hearty response came to this than was expected. The Confederate Governments of Glandelinia in Galverinia and the states of Glandelinia saw that it must now do something at once or its cause would soon be lost, so general Johnston Jackson Manley was urged by general John Manley's son but superior general to make a most strong effort without the slightest delay to capture Angellia Agathia before the new Christian armies marching from southern and middle Angellia should be brought to Angellia Agathia help.

General Jackson Manley at once formed his plans of operation--he crossed with a part of his main army of two hundred million men near the point of land into the main region of Mombi with one quarter of his entire army and leaving the rest to continue the siege of Angelina Arathia encamped with this form at Mombi December the seventh. His main plan was to take possession of other points still in the possession of the Angelinians so as to open canal communication with Angelina Arathia for his army by way of the Aronburgs Run Valley, then to push on with the remainder of his extensive army, entice General Ian Aronburg to pursue him, and then turn the stationary army upon him, defeat the Angelinian Federals, and march immediately upon Angelina Arathia and obtain possession.

Learning through his spies of general Manley's intentions general Concentinian Aronburg at once set out with his Abidinians to drive him back. Leaving general Richardson with a large force of troops to defend Little Mired to cross the Arathia and Aronburgs Run streams with about an army of ninety million men, and advanced the forces in ten thousand abreast toward Mombi, his advance was cautious, careful, but swift and abrupt--giving such overwhelming numbers as moving against him so suddenly general Federal who opposed it did not wait to be attacked but at Manley's orders fled at the approach of the Angelinians. When the retreating glandelinian troops under general Federal reached Mombi to rain force the rest there preparations were made to resist general Concentinian Aronburg's advance, but to make it worse general Robert Vivian's army also was advancing to close in on both Manley and Federal at Mombi and seeing that they were too terribly overwhelmed to battle the two glandelinians successfully both Manley and Federal finally evacuated Mombi and fifteen pitchforks and also Chamberlains and Topsy, the Angelinians following the rebels in fifteen thousand abreast columns over the rivers and other creeks and through Gertrude Angeline plain into the region of Meldonian Creek. The right and centre columns moved swiftly by way of former Run Creek, general Julio Bonligan and Richard Malated and Fredrickson Parson being in the advance, and the others composed of many corps and divisions under hundreds of generals and other officers by way of Angelina Run on the same range but nearer captured Mombi. When the Angelinians under general Greatheart reached the North Bend of the Angelina Run River he found a large Scout force awaiting him, and a desperate battle ensued on the fifth of December. It continued for an hour, when the rebels there withdrew with the purpose to join general Manley's concentrated force at Angelina Run. In that one hour the Angelinians lost about one million five hundred thousand men in killed wounded and prisoners. Among the killed being the gallant general Alfred Costello. General Vivian had in the meantime at the same time been compelled to fight his way at Herdeude Crossroad. He succeeded in doing so after an all day desperate battle and so on the evening of the same day was within two miles of Clockin Ferry, where general Turner an Abysankilian was in command of a large force of Angelinian troops. This place was indeed in great danger of capture from the fierce Scout troops as they held strong positions on Mary Gold and Maya heights on each side of the Angelina Run. General Vivian immediately started to general Hummers aid, but before reaching him the latter surrendered to general Raymond Federal whose arm was in a sling, thus depriving the Angelinians of an advantage they might easily have gained.

ONCE again like in other times of the great Glandelinian war general Johnston Jacken Manley chronic hesitation to advance in full force asserted itself at the most critical time and proved very unfortunate for the main Glandelinian armies. When he retreated from Mombi he did so because he had professed to believe the Angelinian forces to have overwhelming numbers against him, although actually general Concentinian Aronburg, Vivian and Robert Vivian combined had only sixty three million men, while Johnston Jacken Manley had eighty seven million men and Federal had thirty million. When after retreating for two miles and after his glandelinians posited themselves on small wooded hills heights near the small Railroad Junction of Brookland station on the western side of Aronburgs Run, he neither hesitated or was afraid to attack the Angelinians until he was forcibly placed on the main defensive by a harsh assault of the Christians by both artillery and infantry. When he sent general Mic Hollister Lenord across the Aronburgs Run with a part of his main corps and other divisions commanded by generals picketers Mic-Hollister, Mender Mic-Hollister and Allen Mic-Hollister and they had a most sharp fight, with the extreme right of the Angelinian forces under general Fredrick Nance. The Glandelinian assault was extremely violent and bloody and the resistance of Fredrick Nance's troops was equally as fierce and severe but the rebels were successful in the end and drove the Angelinians back about two miles with dreadful losses. The divisions of general Williams, Mic-Hollister, Poganna and Mic-Hollister Greene of general Aronburg's federal corps passed over the stream under cover of a heavy artillery fire from Leo Costello's batteries and managed to move around to general Fredrick Nance's rear and make him abandon his position and retreated another mile.

Then an hour after this change was made general Vivian reopened the battle with redoubled violence by a fierce and general attack with about eighteen million men on the main Glandelinian left under general general Johnston Federal. General Doubleday Warner was on Vivian's right, general Mander Brookfield on his left, and James Hayne in the main main centre. Until late in the afternoon the contest raged with varying fortunes for both sides. General Noro Vivian watched the progress of the battle from the opposite side of the region of Brookland. General Bonnellan with the left wing of the Angelinians, distinguished himself like the greatest hero in the world in this tremendous battle holding the enemy in check for six hours and repulsing twelve tremendous assaults and fighting back the enemy right and centre under generals Deldon Federal and his Brother Tomas Federal until the rebels were heavily reinforced by general A.P. Norman Federal from the direction of south branch Run near Erwin Creek. The desperate struggle lasted fully thirteen hours along a line of battle twenty miles in extent and ended only because of darkness and not because of defeat. Both armies that one day suffered great and enormous losses that of the Angelinians being 12,122,470, in killed and wounded alone while twice that many were disabled or taken prisoner. The rebel loss was only 10,000,000. In killed wounded and prisoners General Vivian's shattered army crushed and disorganized and not having been supported for some reason by general Vivian or Concentinian Aronburg, was compelled to withdraw toward Mombi during the following night.

Had general Johnston on Jackson Manley started an immediate and vigorous pursuit he might have made the whole christian force of general ivianias prisoners of war but he could not dare order a pursuit because of the two other more immense armies under ivian and Aronburg confronting him. However on the following morning general Federal himself attempted to advance only to find general iviani and his shattered army safe behind strong works and batteries and positions on the Ozma side of the Erminie Creek. He made a very weak attempt at attack by sending two immense brigades of goodlier troops across the river, but when they had been driven back across the river with great loss, Federal fearing a new attack was compelled to call for reinforcements and supplies to enable him to stand against the Federal Angolinians.

Manley however did not send him fresh troops telling Federal that he had no intention of holding his troops there for he did not believe the Angolinians would so quickly dare cross the creek again. Such an astounding declaration was almost too much for general Federal and he hastened to general Manley's headquarters at Rose White pose own in person to see what it meant. Being satisfied that on account of the support of generals Robert ivian and Concoctinian Aronburg the christian army was in condition to make a successful attack should it be done that he ordered general Manley to give him troops at once. But that foolish general wasted another day in raising all kinds of objections to the carrying out of his orders so that when he did finally come to obey them general ivianias once shattered army was strongly reinforced and reorganized and Federal the main commander was in danger. General Johnston Jackson Manley had not advanced very far before he foolishly decided to again disregard the instructions given him to go again Concoctinian Aronburg and the two other christian generals simultaneously, and just as prepared to move his armies southward with the purpose of attacking Ozma and Betay gobbin on the east side of the Erminie Creek. This indeed seemed to have been the last straw that broke the back of patience and faithfulness of general Raymond Richardson Federal. He notified general John Manley of his fathers conduct and his son soon to it promptly that his father was relieved from the command of the besieging armies around Angolinia Agathia, and placed general Raymond Richardson Federal in his place, while general Johnston Jackson Manley was transferred north to take charge of Calverine and the glandelinian army there.

General Raymond Richardson immediately reorganized his own army which he at this time in front of Dorothy Gale and her outposts contained about one hundred and twenty million men on a line of siege sixty miles in extent. With a la part of this force he decided to bring about the capture of Dorothy Gale as early as possible, rather than attempt the destruction of ivianias army. Thus making all points of Erminie creek he possessed his main base of supplies and batteries of defense he took measures to place his main army at or as near to Mombi as possible as we know on the west side of Erminie Creek. General iviani was at this time east of Mombi on the heights of hills near a rough little stream called Puggy Mullane with about eighty million men and three hundred thousand cannon that when Federal's army reached the north section of Erminie Creek during the second week in December the two immense opposing armies lay in long parallel lines within very cannon shot of each other, with the narrow little stream between them. Far to the left and right of ivianias were the two immense christian armies under ivian and Aronburg. ivian had destroyed two hundred and fifty other bridges that spanned the river in that vicinity so that there was no way for the glandelinian troops to cross except on pontoons or by atand floating bridges.

Seven hundred thousand engineers were at once put to work on December the twelfth 1915 to construct as many of these as possible, but these men were continually driven away by hundreds of thousands of Angolinian sharpshooters, concealed in all the front buildings of Mombi and other small villages on the front river shore. Indeed desperate efforts were made to quell this deadly annoyance by opening a heavy artillery fire upon the town and near by villages from batteries placed on Erminie Heights, but although thousands of buildings were set on fire, or razed and blown down and the streets smothered in wreckage, the immense army of sharpshooters held their place and continued their deadly work, while with a tremendous roar heard for hundreds of miles the Angolinian artillery repounded.

Then immense parties of glandelinian volunteers crossed the river on the pontoons or open boats by the thousands in the midst of a terrific hail of bullets, grape, canister and shells landed on the other side, and after fierce fighting from house to house and street to street for a while whole day finally dislodged the sharpshooters and routed them with terrible loss. With the Angolinian sharpshooters was an Angolinian drummer boy and many girl and Boy Scouts who having been refused permission to go along to the city and hold repel the building of pontoons had quietly slipped inside some of the small ammunition wagons unseen and therefore were conveyed to the opposite shore side of the town.

Although he saw many men in the bombarded houses shot down, and walls crumbling to pieces by the shell fire of the glandelinians beyond the boy and girl scouts and the drummer boy were undaunted. With their own little deadly pistols and guns they fought the attacking rebels landing from the boats as gallantly as the Angolinian soldiers did and were the last to retreat too.

The sharpshooters having been disposed at last however the pontoon were soon finished, and on the evening of the thirteenth the greater part of the immense glandelinian army crossed over and again occupied Mombi. The next morning the battle of Puggy Mullane began with a series of most desperate assaults by the main Goodlier and Gargoylian forces under the entrenched line of the christians no nearly twenty miles long, and so crowded with great guns and thousands upon thousands of field artillery. The whole scene was like a long conflagration of flame and smoke and the noise was terrible and shook Mombi like an earthquake.

After a most sanguinary battle that lasted until late afternoon Federal's main forces including the troops of Mic-Hollester Phelan, Dallon, Aronburg, Tomza, Norm an and Bernard Federal and fifty other generals were severely repulsed with a loss of 10,000,000. The loss of the Angolinian forces was about four million. On the night of the sixteenth under cover of heavy artillery fire and darkness combined the glandelinian army recrossed the river. In this dreadful engagement general Federal had been severely wounded and on account of his engagement general Federal was compelled at his own request to be relieved of the command of the glandelinian army once belonging to Johnston Jackson Manley until he recovered good enough to serve again, and general Adela-De-Garhe's fighting Garbie's was called took his place. The army of Federal's badly shattered by the blow at Puggy Mullane was then reorganized as quickly as possible, and during the following days many changes of officers had to be made on account of great losses among officers. A most important change was the consolidation of the Gargoylian cavalry which then numbered about twelve million. It was also increased and drilled as much as possible and was soon in a condition indeed of greater efficiency, than it had ever been before.

During the meanwhile while the Angolinians had been driven from the western sections of Mombi before the battle of Puggy Mullane many bands of daring Gargoylian guerrillas hovered upon the rear and flanks of the christian armies or roamed at will all over the country in the vicinity of Angolinia Agathia, plundering the christian inhabitants. One of these big bands of Goodlier Gargoylians led by general Thomas Federal Johnston a handsome rebel general raided in six days throughout the entire state of Ozma and prepared the way for the advance of another big glandelinian army from the town of Lady Decie under general Mic-Hollester Mic-Whirther. This big army made its way toward Ozma town by a rout eastward of Evangeline St. Clara at the same time that general Calmannia Shoemannia, had been moving northward to try his game for Dorothy Gale. Part of general Mic-Whirther's glandelinian army under general E Mic-Hollester Henryson managed to get into the state of Ozma from east Angeline vine State and after routing a large Angolinian force under general Manson charity, near the town of Vandal, October 30th pushed on rapidly through the state in the direction of the Erminie Creek with the purpose to reinforce general Manley. But his onward course came to a sudden stop when he reached Evangeline St. Clara. There he found long impassable fortifications and a large christian force under general Cl G Calmann Shoemann who having possession had proclaimed martial law in the city and elsewhere around it.

General Henryson then turned back and seizing Vandalla remained there to meet the arrival of general Mic-Whirther. General Mic-Whirther entered Ozma State by crossing the Evangelina St. Clare river October 1 the Fifth General J.R. Bomberton Federal, Mic-Holleston Thompson, Mic-Holleston Wallen, and Mic-Holleston Gannon and Honder were leading the way when upon their arrival at Galsoline town they encountered a christian force of Abyssinkilans mostly punchkins under general wilderton Kauffmann. The next morning October the fifteenth the two forces clashed and in a frightful battle of five days duration the glandelinians were defeated with the loss of all their generals, enormous numbers of dead and wounded and all their cannon baggage and ammunition and wagons and six thousand horses. General Kauffmann's relation of over this victory did not last long for three days and a half later another and a stronger glandelinian army appeared under general Webbster Bicknell and fell upon him with such strength that he and his whole christian army was compelled to fly from the field in total and most disgraceful rout. General Mic-Whirther then joined general Bicknell at Anderford and prepared to march on to join Manley's army near Angelina. As it had been his purpose his army then numbered sixty five million men, while general Hennis Bappon Aronburg who was following following him had about sixty million. These two immense armies came together on October the 21 October the twenty eighth near the small but beautiful beautiful town of Joise St. Clare ten miles south of Evangelina St. Clare, and a most severe battle was fought and raged two days. All the first day it continued without abatement and on the following day it resumed with frightful fury, but when the second night set in the glandelinians had had enough of it, and fell back in haste to Landonburg two miles east, and thence out of the state abandoning the expedition. The Angelinians suffered losses in the desperate fight to the extent of four million three hundred and fifty thousand men, while the rebels suffered a loss of three million. In the meantime the many marauding bands of gargoylians all around besieged Angelina Agathia had been so successful in their raids around the rear of the christian lines that soon they had so great extent of wagon trains of provisions in their possession forty five miles in extent and a very small portion of this was ever recaptured.

At this time a portion of general Federal's glandelinian army now under Adole De Garbe commanded by generals Purgatorian, Hennis and Lessie Bicknell had advanced toward Bes Betsy Gobbin under generals Tribune Bicknell, Bicknell Bicknell, Tamerville, Bicknell Bicknell, Meldon Joseph Bicknell, Cooper Bicknell, Cannon Bicknell, Bicknell Goin, Hanson Bicknell, and Bicknell Bell Bicknell. General Hennis Bappon Aronburg hearing of this, sent word to general Winstien, then commanding a portion of the christian army north of Betsy Gobbin of the danger gathering south and east of him. Winstien at once moved to Betsy Gobbin, and as he did so the oval eleven Bicknells and their eleven divisions or armies went to meet him. When they met near the town of Hinchelife, north of Betsy Gobbin, October the 19th general Winstien with only three million men successfully held the ground and his positions against the eleven million men of the Bicknell generals. It was a fierce battle, but finally ended in the flight of the glandelinians southward in the greatest haste and confusion. A most stirring incident of the battle was a desperate struggle hand to hand struggle for the possession of a Winkie Battery which the glandelinians had seized after all the two thousand horses and nearly three thousand of the artillery men had been killed and ten thousand wounded. The Angelinian soldiers although they fought hard as they could could not regain their battery until the battle was fully over and the enemy routed. General Winstien's camp captured nearly one million prisoners. General Hanson Bappon Aronburg greatly afraid of the situation and fearing for general Winstien had sent heavy reinforcements under general William Ambrose Evans to Winstien but they did not reach him or his fiercely battling army until the day was won. General Evans had stopped on his way at a place within two miles of Hinchelife in order to follow out the instructions given him to wait there with his army until he should hear the sound of battle. High wind blowing from the north and a hurrying snow flurries around prevented the sounds of conflict from reaching him and so he knew nothing of the big battle until it was over.

General Winstien now gathered his army at Betsy Gobbin knowing that general Purgatorian Bicknell and his ten Bicknell generals had with general Mic-Whirther united their forces and were preparing to re-attack him. Then he and general Williams Evans moved until it took up a position near Tochney creek one mile of Betsy Gobbin south west. The glandelinians now forty thousand strong moved up from the southeast, and began the assault on Bes Betsy Gobbin on November 3th. For three days the battle of Tochney creek raged with great fury. Many assaults of the rebels were made with telling violence and carried all before it, but finally a late on the second and third days the christians steadily pressed the enemy back. They retreated and rallied and retreated and again rallied and kept up this sort of fighting until they had been driven twenty miles and then finally the glandelinian army was driven back for good and pursued to Trot town where they rallied anew and repulsed the Angelinians toward evening and then removed their flight to the shelter of Manley's main line of works. They lost in this day a desperate and stubborn engagement about nine million men in killed and wounded including three million prisoners, and the Angelinians lost only two million, three hundred and sixty five thousand in killed wounded and prisoners. General Williams Evans who then was at Trot town attacked a part of general Purgatorian Bicknell's retreating army that evening and in the last of the conflict was severely wounded.

During all this time since the outbreak of the bloody siege of Angelina Agathia in the early month of September 1864 Admiral glandell of the glandelinians was making active preparations for the capture of Angelina Agathia and Dorothy Gale by the w. river side, which by general Johnston Jackson Manley then still in command were believed to be the only instructions to the free navigation of the Angelina gun river for the army of besieging insurgents.

Indeed as the world would know in this story if you please to mention Dorothy Gale herself was most particularly important point of defense for Angelina Agathia as the city itself stood on verhigh ground among a portion of the Vivian Hills on the northern bank of the Angelina gun and was strongly fortified with fortifications fortified camps and the like by the Angelinians who used the town as a mobilization camp and headquarters. Until it alone could be taken the wicked glandelinian governments could not hope to carry out any of its plans for gaining control of the great Angelina river or even capture the Mic-Hollie Mic-Holleston's fortifications and gain access to Angelina Agathia. On sept. 19th the glandelinian forces without a struggle or loss captured a small outlying village or the outskirts of Dorothy Gale called Lini greede and thus made impossible for the glandelinian fleet under Admiral glandell to go up to the river close to the rear of Dorothy Gale, where after consultation with the commanders of merrimacs, gunboats and warships and other runs in the vicinity he opened a desperate attack upon the batteries and fortifications on shore. He met a terrible fire of destructive results and to avoid the guns of the fortresses and city he had a desperate effort made to cut canals and place pontoon bridges across three peninsulas in front of the rear of Dorothy Gale, but failing sadly in this on account of the fire of the Angelinians from all the houses on shore and from the christian batteries doing incalculable damage he was compelled to cease his attack, and withdrew his badly battered vessels down the river.

A little later about a week if you please observe an Angelinian force consisting mostly of Dombobians, led by general J.G. Polydectes made fierce attempts to regain Lini greede the outskirts sections of Dorothy Gale, then held by the army of glandelinian Scoodlers under general Thomas Joe Rae Senguline. A severe two days battle was the result on a ten mile battle line. The carnage was frightful and inhuman both sides fighting with savage fury. During the battle a Scoodler division of Mic-Hollestonians which did most splendid work and repulsed ten frightful charges of the Dombobians lost all of its generals and every field commander of all rank besides half of its number and still held ground. When general Senguline noticed this disaster and terrible slaughter of men and officers he dashed in front of the survivors and led them in person until he was shot and killed by a ball entering his head. It was a dreadful battle within half a mile of Dorothy Gale, but his glandelinians at the loss of their general and so many men and officers soon fell back in confusion and the Angolians recaptured the town. The losses on both sides though greater than any battle ever fought outside of Angolia Agathia was withheld. At the same time this sickening battle occurred a glandelinian fleet of Ben Ram, battleships and huge gunboats under Admiral Mellenoller intended for the destruction of all the defensive christian vessels in the Angolia run river, appeared above Lindgreede to help in the fray or defense of the captured outside town. It clashed with the christian fleet under Commodore Turner and every ship of the rebel was disabled some blowing up and to pieces and causing dreadful loss but the rebel fleet however won the battle and repulsed the attack of the christian fleet. It did no good however because the christian army recaptured Lindgreede.

All this time the whole region outside the christian lines and christian mobilization camps had been so overrun with Gargoylian raiders and fierce guerrillas that in October the rear portions of the christian lines and camps were fully guarded. With a force of thirty million men in a long line under general J.M. Astomoeia he soon in series of skirmishes and small battles dispersed these many roaming bands around Angolia Agathia and drove the Gargoylians back to Manley's main line. The main Gargoylian army then gathered near Manley's contr under general T.M. Zee Rade. But general Astomoeia followed them with eight million troops under general James Wood. The latter soon came across a portion of Rades army near Port Jane near Los Angeles creek on October the twenty second, and attacking the Gargoylians most fiercely drove them back two miles but at the cost of dreadful numbers of men and officers for Gargoylians are hard fighters and cannot be easily defeated. Another portion of Gargoylian troops was found on the Ermdine creek eight miles from Angeles and they were driven into their own encampments by an Abyssinkilian cavalry force under general F.J. Goodheart.

Gathering about twenty million horsemen of Manley's main cavalry force and being assisted by Scoodlers, Scoodler cavalry and the dreaded "Hooded Terror", and the others general Zeile prepared to make a determined effort to recover Los Angeles. He started out against general Goodheart late in October. After desperately attacking and defeating Goodheart's advance guard composed of general Elmer Mic-Holleston infantry, artillery division and two long lines of cavalry on Veldon junction, took up a strong position. He then sent for Doubt Double Day Federal who was just then across the creek and the two united the approach of Goodheart's main army. The latter soon came with eleven thousand million men expecting to crush or deal a crushing blow against general Goodheart's army but the combined christian forces fought them desperately in a sanguinary battle at La-Algele defeated the big Gargoylian army and drove the rebel troops in the wildest confusion over to the main rebel line.

Meanwhile vigorous efforts were made to recover Trot from the rebels. Admiral Zimmerman with a small squadron of battle ships sailed up to the water front of Locolgero in October and demanded its surrender. Meeting with a prompt and defiant refusal he started a destructive bombardment but was repulsed. He then tried to capture the town of Parisia. This was also bombarded and it finally surrendered. At this time general God Frey Zeouris leading an expedition sent out by general Whidmans Evans to gain control of La Palanca had a severe engagement with the glandelinians at Mahannonville October the twenty ninth. The glandelinians however were victorious.

Toward the close of the month of October general Hanson's divan hearing of the determined efforts of the enemy under Shoomania to try and capture portly Gale moved southward with a hundred divisions and twice that many generals and on October the 30th reached the banks of the Aronburgs run west of Ozma town near Heddaram town. To his surprise on the opposite side of the river within very cannon shot was general Beppo Evans big Scoodler army with such good leaders as general Henry Perry, Collier Stanck, Abraham Pance, Aronburg Turner, globeurne Raporia, gedernish Jennings, Bonillian Godfrey, and Howard Stavone.

General Beppo Evans had come up from Manley's extreme right by way of evangeline at glare river and had concentrated his main forces at Heddaram just south of Ozma town about six miles.

The next morning on All saints Day November the first a most fearful battle began with Hanson's main army and the rebels under the other generals. Hanson's divan sent general Mic-Mic-Winter Rickman to fall upon the left of the glandelinian army of Scoodlers, while the Scoodlers supported by Turnamarians, Mic-Hollestonians and Gargoylians, had massed in strong massive lines and made an overwhelming dash on a six mile front upon general Hanson's divan right held by general Raymond Hanson. The latter after most desperate fighting for three hours was soon hard pressed by the overwhelming numbers, and sent to general Hanson's divan for assistance. General Hanson sent the reply:

"Hold every inch of ground at all costs. If you manage to hold your post I will swing my forces into Trot and Betay Gobbin, and by a loft movement rush my Abyssinkilians into Heddaram and cut Beppo Evans Scoodler army off from certain communications from Manley."

But the vehement attack upon general Raymond Hanson was too savage, wild and too strong to withstand, and though they fought desperately, and tried every effort to hold the Scoodlers back the troops of Dombobians and Angolians were slowly driven back, and general Hanson saw that he must change his original plans at once and hasten to the assistance of his right grand division. Meanwhile general Turner Winters was also assailed most desperately. The Mic-Hollestonians and Turnamarians supported by fierce Omarians and Scoodlers advanced toward him and his army in a compact mass seventeen miles long across open fields, through woods, and pairing like a flood of gray humanity across Jennie Creeklike at once opened fifteen batteries upon them, and shot their line of assailants to pieces, but yet yelling like fiends they kept bravely on until within about sixty rods, when general Winters' troops who had been lying in the woods in a line for ten miles under cover suddenly rose to their feet like a uprising tidal wave and made the woods crash like a thousand volcanoes in eruption with their musketry fire. From the frightful slaughter among their ranks the Mic-Hollestonians appalled broke and fled but the Scoodlers came on and struck the Angolians a terrible blow and drove them with shattered lines clear from the woods and captured Winters' whole line of artillery.

Hanson sent assistance to Winters and after a four hours horrible conflict the rebels lost a 11 they gained and were driven back with half their number killed and wounded and two generals killed. The Scoodlers at once sent more immense divisions against Winters and the struggle was renewed and raged for another four hours on a thirteen mile battle line but the Scoodlers were again repulsed. After three more times with frightful fury and violence he was attacked the Scoodlers trying to press their attacks with irresistible violence but each time he and his troops stood their ground and poured such murderous volleys into the surging rebel columns that the enemy with terrible loss broke and fled.

But again the conflict with him was renewed with terrible earnest. The losses soon became so great and so awful that it seemed for a time as if the battle between general Winters and Beppo Evans would only end when there were no more troops to fight. At length the Abyssinkilian division composed of Munchkins and Winkies and also Conventinians, with the aid of Dombobians and Tripleiglonians and Abhismanians made a simultaneous counter charge on the whole glandelinian army and after six hours of fearful fighting of which losses in officers on both sides was dreadful broke and scattered the whole of Beppo's army in wild and disorderly confusion. We readers and even the writer here can question if a more spirited result was ever accomplished than the results of the final charge of general Winters' division on the afternoon of that terrible All St Saints day at this battle of Heddaram. About five o'clock in the afternoon

General Hanson's divan seeing that the enemy was giving way on his front and that a most critical moment had arrived, gave orders for general Winters to cross the Ermdine Creek or river and drive the enemy from his position which the routed troop troops had rallied when they gained it. This was indeed in a manner worthy of the most disciplined and bravest christian troops ever known in the Angolian world or real world.

or real world. The Winkie and Murchkin Abyssinkilians in the face of a galling fire of great intensity along a retail line of four fourteen miles in length dashed into the river, the Angelinians, gondolians, Abitaculians, Concoctulians and the Tripoligulians fol, following close behind in a storming yelling tidal wave of red and purple uniformed men. The scene was grand in the extreme though for a time the firing was so fierce that it seemed as if a forest fire had broken out, and the thousands of explosions fairly rumbled the air. However it was a momentous battle on a tremendous scale. The Scoodlers the most desperate of the glandelinian fighters supported by the other rebels tore the surging christian tidal waves to fragments by the effects of a murderous fire of minkstry shells and grape but nothing could reds resist the gallant christian soldiers, for on they rushed like a wild cyclone of doom. The glandelinians from behind the walls of earth, stones, fences, and from hill's hillocks and from behind the creek met the tremendous shock as a breakwater does the storm wave, then wavered before the irresistible pressure, and then were driven back with stupendous loss at the bayonet point, step by step, fighting like fiends hand to hand with the Angelinians for about a mile and a half, when overpowered by the fierce Winkies they broke and fled ever and anon rallying desperately to check the too hasty pursuit of the Christians.

The capture of general glandburgs Scoodler battery of nearly a thousand grant guns during the same battle was the most gallant and desperate yet reckless achievement and yet worthy of the finest christian troops in the world of Angelina. Besides the two thousand guns this battery also consisted of one hundred and twelve centimeters a cent centimeter centimeters guns, six hundred and twelve twelve pound Napoleons, eighty big howitzers, and six hundred six pound rifled cannons. These were admirably served and did dreadful execution among the attacking christians. Over it flaunted the colors of the glandelinians and the standard of general Manleys himself. This battery extending for six miles with situated on a rising ground in wheatfields wheatfields, hidden by wheat, in cornfields, and in beet and other fields besides in a big cow pasture, while a portion of the Mic-Holleston woods afforded a most excellent retreat for the glandelinians. After the Angelinian and other troops under general Winters had succeeded in crossing the Erminis creek and driving the foe from its position and driven the enemy before them, a general rush of the troops under general Antonio Philipus was made to storm this immense battery which still maintained its fire a perfect drum drum of flame and din. The first brigades to reach this battery of horror were the Abyssinkilians under general Jacksonia Handdan Handonia who though wounded severely, still kept the field and acted throughout with a valor worthy of the days of the Gallant Crusades. Up went the immense or urge of brave Abyssinkilians bayonet in hand to the very muzzles of the guns which still belched death and annihilation to the advancing roaring tidal wave of men. The guns once reached the gunners were driven from them by the Angelinians but it took two hours desperate fighting before the immense battery was their own. The glandelinian colors were captured after a desperate resistance, the glandelinian color bearer a Scoodler whose name was James Hurnerton fighting wildly for them until two bayonet thrusts through his right arm and a bulley bullet wound wound in his abdomen compelled him to drop them. The whole rebel force was then routed for the main line of Manleys and fled like sheep.

The Angelinians lost at the battle of Heddarrann in killed and wounded in one day 26,778,999, and about one million five hundred thousand prisoners. The glandelinians lost more than 10,000,000 and about six million two hundred and five hundred prisoners own combined. Great alarm and intense discouragement were produced among the whole rebel army at Angelina Agathia siege and among their many leaders and also among the people of glandelinia by this crushing blow.

It marked the last of a series of failures the glandelinians had made in every aggressive movement, from the recapture of Mombi, to Heddarrann.

CHAPTER FOURTY FIVE.

WHEN the war had already been going on for nearly four years and a half already and the siege of Angelina Agathia by the enemy had been on for full away, the Angelinian governments and other authorities saw now for sure that something must be done to do away with the horrible child slave system of the enemy, as not only were they a horrible evil but through the child slavery the glandelinians the authorities could call on every available man in the nation to fight against the christian governments without the necessity of leaving some or any to do farm work or factory work or work of other kinds and produce food and provisions for the army, the slaves being put to that work, even surprising to say scores of scores of thousands of boy slaves were in the glandelinian army as scouts not forces forced to do it but of their own full free will and surely were not worth fighting for at that. So also on the twenty third of November 1914 the Angelinian authorities proceeded to take full means to put an end to slavery existing in Calvernia if they had to lay waste to Calvernia to do so for the redance of the rebels against the Angelinian governments was becoming stronger than ever. As we also have seen the chief object of the wicked glandelinian forces at the very beginning of the siege of Vivian was key was the capture of Dorothy Gale, Gale and Ozma these towns fronting both the Erminis and Angeline run rivers. For this very purpose at the very beginning general Manley had concentrated his most famous army in the world near the four rivers in long lines of siege, while his fleets guarded all approaches to the cities by water. At the very beginning he had planned to get to the rear of Dorothy Gale by capturing Fortress Angelindia, then await the arrival of general Raymond Richardson federal, who was to pass down from the north of Aronburgs Run, guarded by an immense fleet of warships, then up the Mic-Holleston Run to a point where he could make a full junction with Manleys forces of siege. Now the edge was on and for fullway. After the many actions already described general Federal who had now been replaced by Adele-De Garbe was removed to the north under care of his body guard for the recovery from his wounds and Adele-De-Garbe fewing serious results of his successive defeats decided to change his positions and therefore moved a part of his army south of Mombi, where in his defeat he had left a large quantity of supplies to his christian enemies, then he moved his other section north of Mombi, then on to Kittens riecherts after flanking a strong force of christians drawn up for battle on the other side of the Erminis Run. While there and while making these movements general Adele-De-Garbe learned that general Jimmie Vivian force guarding the supplies near Kittens riecherts and effectively destroyed them and captured the hole force. This compelled Adele-De-Garbe to withdraw his right grand division to Erminis Junction. Meanwhile general Zoe Ras Buster with twelve million troops, left Adele-De-Garbes rear in many transports, with hundreds of siege guns, to beleaguer Dorothy Gale. At Grand Point he was joined by Admiral Frarrer and his fleet of warships, and they all went up the Angeline Run river. An attempt was made to capture some very strong batteries which protected the rear of Dorothy Gale but after a short battle at Chic kadoo glandale Dromer 25th general Zoe Ras Buster was badly repulsed and retired to Eldon Gale point opposite the mouth of the Erminis Creek where the main army was concentrated twelve miles above Dorothy Gale.

General Gus Ruse Guster then took his forces from Grandeur down the river to the same place after convincing himself by his own desperate schemes that the city could not be taken by direct assault while waiting for general Guster, general John Phelan Johnson who arrived at headquarters near Porrothy Gale proper and took temporary command captured Fortress Angoldinia at Esmania post fifteen miles from the mouth of the Kramine Run, January eleventh. The troops were conveyed by Admiral Glanders transports and battleships and also runs to within three miles of the gigantic fortress where they were landed in immense droves. Gander then passed up to close range and a sharp conflict of long duration raged. The fort was soon surrendered with five million prisoners. The following week Gander made fierce attempts to run past the batteries on the shore at the rear of Porrothy Gale with nearly his whole fleet and a large number of transports which were protected from shot and shell by immense bales of cotton and other soft material. These one hundred transports were manned by brave volunteers but the ships met such a heavy annihilating fire that the attempt was unsuccessful. General Gus Ruse Guster then waited five days or more for general Henry Phelan who had simultaneously been sent to capture a large bluff on the river shore. Being badly unsuccessful in this desperate enterprise general Phelan recrossed the stream and joined general Guster on January the eighth. The army then started for Violodinia another fortress of the river side of the city. On the way they found a very large force of Angoldinians strongly posted near the fortification in the woods and in strong works along the river front, near the small farm of Brookman. They were driven out of the woods and out of their positions after a severe battle of three days, and the Glandelinians then were able to continue their advance. Generals Phelan and Double Day Federal Johnston were in the advance and when they arrived to within two miles of Violodinia they came upon an Angoldinian force under general Fyans Herdrude. General Doubleday Federal Johnston at once attacked the main body of Angoldinians, while Phelan passing around flanked the Angoldinians and soon drove them from their fortress, rifle pits and other works. Then after a nonsensical sharp engagement the Angoldinians here fled northward, leaving however only three hundred three hundred and fifty prisoners, and eighteen guns. The Glandelinians under Guster then took possession of the fortress. He left general Phelan there to destroy all the war materials and public property, while he with a large force marched on to St Vincente Church and St Josephs hospital in which region where general Henry Phelan or with twenty five million men had a very strong position. Upon his arrival there general Guster decided to wait until general P Phelan Johnston with his army could come up, but the Angoldinians however would not wait, and on the morning of January the sixteenth began a desperate battle. The struggle was furious but short, and Dangers troops with some loss was driven from the field and fell back to Gertrude Angelina Railroad Bridge. There they were followed by the enemy and again defeated an after a general conflict, and sent flying in disorder to Porrothy Gale. The victorious Glandelinian army swept on and started then to closely invest Porrothy Gale and its immense mobilization camps and other positions and fortresses. A desperate assault by the whole army upon the camps was soon ordered, general Guster expecting that in the demoralized condition of the Christian army it might be easily be taken that way. But he found it took strongly fortified, and what was left of the assaulting troops were withdrawn. After a rest of three days he decided to make another effort to carry the camps and fortified works and forts in the rear of Porrothy Gale by storm. At eight o'clock on the morning of the twenty third almost the whole army moved at appointed signals and in a line of assault five miles long made a tremendous dash upon the National National works. In this battle a terrible scene indeed took place. The earthworks, the frowning fortifications, the very encampments and all the roofs of house-tops of the city at the edge became almost a mass of flame and smoke as they poured forth an annihilating fire upon the uncovered Glandelinian troops below. Bravely in the face of dugged resistance the Glandelinian army struggled and captured the outer works which were strewn like straw blown from a haystack by wind with dead and wounded, and despite the terrible loss strove desperately to gain a foothold on the camps where they could stop the murderous guns from the fortifications and the city roofs.

After a time general Phelan Johnson sent word to general Guster that he had won the outer fortifications and wanted reinforcements to hold them, and enable him to push further on and capture the forts. Therefore more and more troops were sent to him and new vigor was put into the desperate and bloody assault. But it was one of the most false hopes of the war. General Phelan Johnson had not gained as much ground as he had thought, and after a little more slaughter, the broken Glandelinian army was at length compelled to fall back and abandon the awful struggle. General Guster now saw that he could not take the works or camps in the rear or front of the city of Porrothy Gale by storm, and so with the co-operation of the fleets began a regular siege. He at once sent for reinforcements demanding as much men as could be spared and when these soon came the investment of Porrothy Gale was complete. He arranged his forces by placing general Phelans divisions on the right, Hindernine Johnstons on the left and extending to the many railroad lines going to through the region and general Heller Johnstons on the centre with the divisions of Fisher Clayton and Wio Key Landon lying across the river banks, and touching the opposite bluffs and other high landscapes on three of the river waterways near by. General Johnston Fredrickson corps and the divisions of general John Hollister Phelan and Kimball Barclay were sent to a Napoon gun. For more than a month the siege of Porrothy Gale continued. Tremendous broadsides of shot and shell miles long; for volleys followed each other in quick succession throughout every day and night without intermission. Batteries on land and water sent destructive storms of explosives into the very heart of the city as well as into the encampments and upon the fortresses, playing havoc with thousands of buildings, sending many to destruction totally making big fires in the mobilization camps and among the fortresses, setting woods and grassy plains on fire until they looked like vast fur furnaces and driving the immense troops of soldiers who were not in their dugouts and military caves to the works for protection and also to the forts.

While the terrible storm of iron and explosives was dropping on the devoted Glandelinian Gusters armies dug their way nearer and nearer to the camps and the city, until one portion of the army got close enough to undermine one of the main principal forts in the main line of defenses on the land side. This was done and the fort blew up with fearful effect and raised windows by the millions in Angoldinia Agathia Porrothy Gale, and scores of city cities many miles away by the concussion and caused three hundred Angoldinian soldiers to be killed and a million wounded. Meanwhile famine stared in the face of the remaining population of the besieged city and the soldiers of the camps. The food was portioned out as sparingly as possible and worse of all the people had to eat anything they could lay their hands on that was at all edible.

At last toward March general Hanson had sent immense armies that itself invested the Glandelinian army and Porrothy Gale making a siege within a siege and so many assaults were continued that finally on March the twenty third a flag of truce went up from the fortified Glandelinian works, and two generals appeared before general Germaine Phelan who conducted the siege within a siege with a note from general Guster in which he suggested the appointment of fifty commissioners to settle upon terms of surrender. General Germaine Phelan wrote in reply that he would not and could not listen to anything but an immediate surrender that he would accept no conditions whatever, that it would be useless to even appoint any commissioners, and if general Guster wished for the siege to have an end he could have it done by an agreement on unconditional terms. General Guster then asked for a complete and personal review, and the two great generals met midway between the opposing lines under a Cedar tree when general Germaine Phelan with a sneer repeated that his terms were nothing but an unconditional surrender. General Guster gave a haughty answer and made Germaine Phelan understand that he would never surrender as long as he had a man with him.

"You may do as you like then for all I care" was Germaine Vivians astounding answer. "You can continue the defense till doomsday if you like and for all eternity too but nevertheless my army never was in a better condition than it is now and I'm sure I can continue the siege equally as long as you can stand it." Thus not being able to agree between them the interview ended. But general Gustar and his officers saw that being placed between two fires, from the city and from the besieging christian army that the Glandelinian army would meet annihilation in a short time soon agreed upon an unconditional surrender and so the rebel army which had in vated Dorothy Gale with the purpose to capture her and her strong works was surrendered and Germaine Vivian secured thirty seven million prisoners, and a vast amount of cannons which were surrendered April the fourth. Thus ended the siege of Dorothy Gale with a loss to the enemy of thirty seven million prisoners, among whom were two hundred and fifteen general officers, at least ten million killed and wounded, and among the killed sixteen generals not named here at least and hundreds of thousands of stragglers who could never be collected or reorganized. Arms and munitions of war for an army of sixty million men had fallen into Germaine Vivians hands to the surprise of his very father, besides a large amount of other army property, consisting of Glandelinian shipping, two thousand rebel locomotives, immense trains of passenger coaches, a million pounds of cotton, one, small parlor cars, a long line of steamboats, a million pounds of cotton, and a train of wagons forty miles long, and much more had been destroyed to prevent the Angelinians from capturing it. Germaine Vivians own loss and of the defenders of the city and camps a combined together in killed and wounded and missing was estimated at about eight hundred thousand, eight hundred and fifty seven.

In the meantime or at the same time general Zimmermann Francis Selma Schmidt after an active campaign toward Angelinia Agathia he for a while managed to break the christian power in the northern and central region of Ozma had invested that town then in command of general Robert Vivian himself.

With the assistance of Admiral Gaudens immense squadron of warships and fire bomb batteries and floating batteries, he began the siege of Ozma late in October. Like Gustar at Dorothy Gale he made thirty most desperate but bloody and unsuccessful and disastrous attempts to take the place by storm. For eighty days the siege here continued. At length the want of ammunition and the threatening extending of Hansons army to invest him made it impossible for him to hold the siege any longer and he immediately withdrew to the shelter of Manleys main army. The Glandelinians lost during the siege and battles about three million men in killed and wounded, and the Angelinians who repelled the siege lost only eighty thousand in killed wounded and missing. The capture of general Gustars army which invested Dorothy Gale and the brave defense of Ozma and the defeat of the rebel army there sent a thrill of joy throughout the whole Angelinian nation, for in the people of the very Angelinian world could see without the slightest doubt the early ending of the siege and failure of the enemy to capture Angelinia Agathia. The two tremendous defeats here to the enemy would be blows to the main besieging armies around Angelinia Agathia from which it could never recover. From the successful resistance even so far the two Vivians and Concentinian Aronburg were hailed as the greatest of Angelinian generals and indeed took a high place in the regard of the whole world.

A little before the battle of Hedda Rann the main section of the army of Glandelinians under general Joseph H. Darger remained in comparative quiet on the southern and northern side of the Erminie Run Creek, near the main town of Ozma tip for nearly two months. This section of the Scoodler Army numbered about 100,000,000 men while general Francis Vivian's army numbered but sixty five million five hundred and sixty six thousand, as a large force of his army under general Richardson Logan had been detailed to watch the movements of the main forces of the Angelinian Federals under general Vivian and Hanson in the main vicinity of Angelinia Agathia, during these two months however nothing but several severe cavalry movements disturbed the two armies. Early in October the Angelinian troopers under general Gloucester Anderson opposite Ozma and Trot were attacked by a monstrous mounted force of Zimmermannian cavalry under general W.H.F. Picknell.

and on October the eighteenth the Angelinian forces at Glandonan Courthouse were surprised suddenly in the middle of the night, by a fierce band of Gargoylian guerrillas led by general Shields. They dashed furiously into the village and after taking a large number of prisoners and killing a number of women and even innocent girls and boys, among them the governor and leading persons of that place besides the christian general who commanded the troops galloped away and even defeated their pursuers. A little later the rear real first severe cavalry contest of the siege of Angelinia Agathia took place. It was between a large body of Concentinian horsemen led by general Costello Gardenal and a large force of mounted Gargoylians, under general Fritzhage Phelan Evans. They met at Turners Junction on the beautiful Erminie Creek and after a severe battle the Angelinian cavalry force were repulsed with great loss if you please to mention. Mention then the two months had really gone pass with nothing unusually accomplished, general Darger determined at the urging of Adele-De-Carbo to put his army in motion toward Ozma and make a fierce attempt to capture it and get around to the rear of Angelinia Agathia. Then while his main left wing under general Samuel Palto oneroged general Franco is Viviananna in front general Darger took sixty million of his own troops of his own right wing, maybe it was a birds wing, across the river in fourteen immense columns under twenty generals and moved it several miles north of Ozma and Tip to Trot Junction a small village near Ozma. General Henry Darger of the rebels made his headquarters there and began to intrench himself.

He placed general Shoemannia Phelansonia many divisions on his extreme right, with general Phelan Mic-Hollester next to him, general Slocum Cammilian in the main centre, and general Couch David and Mic-Hollester Randolph on the left hand wing.

General Francis Viviananna instead of being frightened at these preparations of the immense Scoodler army and retreating toward Ozma encampments as Joseph Darger expected go sent general Wienstien and Ambrose Evans with a most large force early in the evening of a posary Day to strike the immense Glandelinian army a most heavy blow. General Dargers troops went out to meet him in a battle line ten miles long but after an extremely terrible battle were driven back with frightful loss to their intrenchments. The following morning general Viviananna sent Wienstien with the whole of the Abyssinkilian command under his order about twenty five million men to execute a most grand left flank movement on Dargers extreme left and right. He where general Shields was stationed. He and his force of Abyssinkilians managed to cut their way through a tangled wilderness, which indeed effectively covered his approach or hid it rather, and reaching Shi Shields position, suddenly burst from the woods upon him. Fierce and most terrible was the onslaught on a line of charge seventeen miles long, the whole Glandelinian army at that section being crushed like an egg shell with the loss of a hundred generals in a fearful all day long fight. Toward evening the broken pieces of that once immense rebel line was driven back upon the main army. In vain did the gallant Shields gallop furiously among his panic stricken Scoodlers and Zimmermannians and strove to rally him them. His entire army was completely wrecked and routed and he even could not save it from terrible disaster. Back it fell like a panic stricken torrent of human beings, and now Wienstien was about to gain the whole rear of the Glandelinian army. But general Joseph Henry Darger taking in his peril at a glance, sent six big divisions under general Berry Sanderson and other generals to the rescue. Presenting a solid front to the enemy it enabled general Cammilian and Shields to rally their troops behind it, and general Wienstiens victorious course was soon checked. But regardless of the terrible hurricanes of grape and canister and bullets that poured into their lines from thirty stretches of artillery extending for sixteen miles massed in front of the battling Glandelinian surge of men, the Angelinian and Abyssinkilian forces wildly and insanely continued their desperate headlong attack until late in the evening.

Just after the conflict had ended along this section the Angelinians temporarily lost one of their best commanders and most brilliant leaders.

While leading one of the dreadful onslaughts in the evening general Johnston was shot and severely wounded by an Abbianinian machine gun. At the same time of that fatal morning the battle also raged elsewhere by a rebel attack upon the Abbianinian line under general Zoe Wickes. The Glandelinians were bravely and fiercely met by the main Abbianinian divisions of generals Carter Harrison, Walter John Harrison, and Richard Logan their immense infantry lines being supported by four thousand one hundred and forty pieces of heavy field pieces. For over three hours amid fearful losses these divisions made a brave stand against general Cannonia Johnston who led the assault, and the fierce Scoodler glandelinians unmounted by the heavy cannonading and fierce musketry fire they received, dashed up at a furious pace in an immense line like an irresistible tidal wave and drove the hard Logan corps and other divisions gradually back, and after sixteen hours hard and sanguinary fighting they were pushed from the field to a most strong position on the roads back of Trot and Betsy. Here the rebel line came up anew like a fierce storm wave but was gradually shattered and repulsed with the loss of their generals. While his tremendous part of the battle was being fought at Purgersonia general Zoe Wickes Hannonia with general Viviananna right main wing had crossed the Erminia on Henry Dargers main front and by a brilliant dash had captured the heights of Betsy Bobbin near the town by that name after three of the columns being annihilated in the enemy's inferno of musketry and cannon.

When leaving a large part of this force to hold these works should the insurgents counter charge he took his main army toward Trot and Betsy Bobbin to join general Viviananna. Learning of his movement and having general Viviananna well in hand, general Darger immediately dispatched an overwhelming force of Mic-Hollesstinians to intercept him. There was a severe conflict on a line of six miles and general Hannonia was compelled to retreat across the river to potesys ford. The troops left in the heights were also fiercely attacked and driven clear over the river. General Viviananna soon followed with the rest of the army, reaching the north side of the Erminia Creek in safety on November the fourth, while general Darger resumed his former position on the heights of Betsy Bobbin. The loss on both sides in the of that one day fearful battle was heavy that of the Glandelinians in killed wounded and prisoners being over 17,000,000 and that of the Angelinians about fifteen million. Soon after the frightful battle of Purgersonia general Hindale, as Johnston rejoined general Darger. During his absence he had besieged general St. Clare in a strongly fortified position near Trot also in the hope of driving the Angelinians from that post so as to enable him to seize Ozma from the rear and its vicinity and attack Angelinia Agathia from the rear. But failing in this he abandoned the siege and went back to general Darger.

With this main addition to it general Joseph H. Darger's army was reorganized into many divisions commanded by one thousand generals in all. Then general Darger made confident by his main successes successes at the battle of Purgersonia resolved to push on and make an effort to capture the town of Ozma and also Trot if possible. With this purpose in view he sent his left wing in charge of his Uncle general Augustine Darger toward the Angeline run through the Erminia and Angeline run valley by way of Chester Gump Junction, while general Cannonia Johnston with another large force moved along the eastern section of the river. At St. Patrick's Ford the glandelinian Confederates came upon general Milroy Marcucian with seven million federal Angelinian troops and after a battle drove him and his army across the stream to the shelter of the camps at Dorothy Gale. General Augustine Darger then crossed the main stream and marched rapidly up the valley to within a few miles of the Little Maxwellian opposite Rosa. He was soon followed by the divisions of general Cannonia Johnston and Hindale Johnston and on November the twenty sixth the whole of Darger's army was confronting Trot and Betsy. The army of the Angelinians still under Viviananna which had retreated retreated before Darger's advance took up a position at Button Hole Creek. There general Francis Viviananna and general Evans Turner had a decided disagreement over some proposed military movements concerning Angelinia Agathia and because he was refused to do as he was ordered the latter was forced to resign his command and general Henry Darger of the Angelinians succeeded him. Viviananna for as then numbered one hundred million men and extended for forty miles.

SOLELY the morning after opened around poor little Eva St. Clare. Immense preparations were being made on all sides for a great battle. Troops of all kinds were coming in from everywhere to swell the immense armies, which were soon to close in deadly combat. Promptly had the divisions of the Angelinian armies responded to Viviananna's call and indeed they were all in their appointed positions by two o'clock that morning. The immense christian line of battle extended for nearly twenty five miles along both sides of the Heights of Betsy Bobbin, which overlooked Eva St. Clare and the immense fields and woodlands beyond beyond.

General F. J. Rodney Graves with eleven Abyssinkilian divisions occupied the heights on the right next to him on the left was general Dolekine Mic-Holleston and the Abbianinian corps followed across the main roads leading toward Trot and Betsy on another hill by the first and second and ninth corps, on the left was the Continentian forces under general Maurice Stanley, and Picknells Tripontigians. General Augustine Darger held the centre of his nephew's army with general Mic-Holleston Wailon on the main right and Johnstonia Federal on the left. The battle began at the first dawn of day when Johnstonia Federal made a fierce charge upon Viviananna's main left grand divisions commanded by general Dolekine Mic-Holleston. Amid the terrific crash and thunder of thousands of cannons and the awful roar of musketry and explosions and the fierce yells of the Abyssinkilians whistles the Glandelinians in a series of troops dashed up most savagely and with terrible force and ferocity attacked in splendid order but with seemingly irresistible force and death blow after blow, until the whole left wing of the christian line was shaken, shattered and thrown out of its strong position and gradually fell back unable to withstand the tidal wave.

Just then the Dandobians under general Horace Varney came up and reinforced general Mic-Holleston's driven troops. The struggle was renewed with redoubled violence but nevertheless the arrival of even more reinforcements for Mic-Holleston did not arrest the onslaught of the Glandelinians, instead the terrible fire of the artillery, that swept their immense lines and torn them it to bronze fragments seemed to make the survivors bolder and fiercer than ever, and they bravely continued to attack and force the whole line of Abbianinians and Abyssinkilians now up ordered by Dandobians and Continentinians back. They were at last arrested and an immense fire burst driven away by the arrival of the entire corps of general William Wells corps, and part of the first and second.

A DECEMBER 10.

General Joseph Dargor now determined to move upon Trot and Betsy with his whole force and then push on to Rosa but learning that general Henry Dargor and Viviananna were well across the stream and was now threatening his flanks and rear, he first decided to concentrate his army at Rosa, and then deal such a demoralizing blow upon Dargor and Viviananna that he could be able to push on and march on to Trot, Betsy, Gebbii and also Ozma and then capture Angelina Agathia without trouble. According general Jos Jy Johnston and Augustine Dargor were ordered to march from Topsy and Little Eva St Clare to Rosa, and General Cannonia from Ophelia St Clare. As the advance of general Augustine Dargor's divisions of corps approached their main destination they were met by general Sidney Smith's divisions of corps and a fierce conflict took place. General Henry George Mic-Hollester with the left wing of general Viviananna's army then came up and hastened to the relief of general Sidney Smith's brigades and divisions. Hardly had he reached the field of battle when his divisions were crushed and shattered and he himself and ten of his generals killed while all the rest were wounded and all the regimental and other commanders also killed and wounded. It was a terrible battle at Eva St Clare and the Angelinians who survived were being driven back. General Double Day Federal took general Mic-Hollester's place and bringing up his forces the battle went on with redoubled fury. General F.J. Graves now arrived with his own forces and took personal command. The Angelinians now reinforced and rallied now began to press the enemy back at all points, and seemed to be winning the contest earlier, when general Augustine Dargor's troops appeared on the scene, outflanking general Graves' line of battle. This turned the tide immediately and general Graves was driven off the field to a new and strong position on a range of hills near Little Eva St Clare of which Vivian Hill and Bondon Hill were the two extremes of the line and White Rose ridge at the village was the main apex apex. The immense line of Angelinians twenty miles in extent pressed on furiously capturing one million five or five hundred thousand prisoners until they reached the main ridge of hills where they were met by such a deadly storm of artillery and musketry fire for the extent of ten miles that struggle as they would they had to fall back. They resumed the attack, later, and made ten on successive other onslaughts but were repulsed with dreadful loss and the bloody conflict ended with the day. Learning of general Mic-Hollester's death and the slaughter of so many Christian generals general Viviananna at once dispatched general Walter Starrings to the field and find out and report to him the state of affairs. General Starrings' information was such that general Viviananna determined to give battle at the strong position general Graves had so cleverly selected. He immediately dispatched orders to the many different corps and divisional commanders and other generals to push on their armies with utmost speed for Eva St Clare and then started off himself, reaching the place a little after the approach of midnight. The two rebel Dargor generals also concentrated their immense forces that following night and prepared for the great battle of the next day.

The desperate struggle still continued with most fearful losses on both sides for several more hours. Meanwhile another mighty or titanic contest was going on between Augustus Dargor's troops and the main Christian right concentrated under general Day Federal and Rodney Graves. This desperate fight continued until eleven o'clock in the night when the Angelinians driven back by Graves' fire and shot and ball the worlds of Double Day's Federals on the extreme right of White Rose Hill. The prospect now indeed was a most gloomy one for the Angelinians, when the two armies were armed finally ready for the night. They had been picked back for three miles and a half on both the right and main left wings, they had suffered more losses than any other force engaged around Angelina Agathia during the siege and the so-called soldiers were all tired with hurried marches, and the long and struggles of the day. But general Viviananna knew indeed that he had a most strong position and as a retreat would be disastrous and cause the captures of Ozma and Dorothy Gale and enable the enemy to worst the two divisions and General Cannonia and then capture Viviananna's key he resolved to fight it out right there at no matter what the cost. At eight o'clock the next morning the battle was renewed with greater fury than ever on the main right. General Augustine Dargor attempted with his entire force to advance from the long line of positions he had captured the night before and Rodney Graves determined not only to prevent him doing so, but to recover his lost ground which had been so disgracefully abandoned by Mic-Hollester's corps. Fearlessly and in long lines of attack the Angelinians charged through the sea of smoke and death dealing balls, shells, and grape and canister of artillery. For five hours there was the most desperate struggle of the day and for a moment general Rodney Graves being overwhelmed was pressed back nearly a mile but general Michael Arthur's divisions and corps hurried to his aid and he again advanced. More and still more troops were brought up, and at last Augustine Dargor's brave followers were compelled to give up the struggle and fall back defeated in their determined purpose.

General Joseph Dargor now began to look for a more vulnerable point of attack on the Christian lines, and fixing on the centre he determined to make a most desperate effort to crush it with his artillery and double assaults puffing that night in secret he had brought forward 11,234 cannon of heavy calibre, and on the following morning the fourth day of the battle he opened a most terrific fire upon White Rose Hill and its vicinity for ten miles. No great guns of the Christian possessions to the number of ten thousand, responded and indeed one of the most fearful artillery duels of the siege was begun. For four hours the whole country around hock like a severe earthquake with the reverberations to such an extent that towns reported broken windows fifty miles from Angelina Agathia. Then at noon, near twelve o'clock Dargor ordered the main attack. The attack was made with dreadful violence by the rebels who swept forward in the most heavy columns ever seen before. It seemed that the steady storm of grape, canister, and shells poured upon them had no terrors for them for they hurried on, and when the whole Christian line which held its fire to the last moment poured a storm of volleys and volleys into their main force that annihilated their whole front line. The survivors still kept on and dashing over to the rifle pits and up to the guns bayoneted and drove the cannons away and swept the main Christian line back. The entire Christian line there was almost destroyed and the works in the possession of the foe who against counter charges of fresh troops held it for three hours and awful losses. Soon however their triumph was checked. The guns on the western and eastern slopes of Vivian Hill opened upon them with an annihilating fire of shot and shell, high explosives and grape and canister, and with such awful effect, that but was left of them fled in confusion. But that day ten times more this awful array of attack was repeated until at last the Angelinians had again taken possession of the works and drove the centre of the Angelinian position completely back from the other two wings. But soon again the rebels were counter attacked by heavy reinforcements and finally they were again driven back from all the positions they had won and at night the frightful battle of Eva St Clare was over, the Angelinians having been repulsed at every point with dreadful losses.

That night the fields for many miles over hills and plains presented a most awful sight being covered with dead and wounded men and horses and they were a nation's dead destroyed by some sudden plague. To the Christian side the losses are counted to more than twenty three million men in killed and wounded and prisoners, and a cut thirty to million on the glandelinian side. Side including over one million one hundred and fourteen thousand prisoners. A great indeed as the report of the battle of Eva St. Clare that it was evident that Angelina Agathia was now safe with the fragments of his badly shattered army general Darger began to retreat toward Mendocino's main encampments on the evening of the day after the battle was over. He recrossed the Erminia Creek and pressed on to the Angelina gun, pursued by general Nicholas Archer Archer with six corps divisions. General Darger managed however to hold these Angelinian forces at bay until he made ready to cross the river which had been swollen by the blowing up of dams by the Angelinians with the purpose to flood the enemy lines and drive them back, by pontoons and by fording. General Viviana followed him half a day later and pushed forward his armies in three directions, one by way of Erminia Creek another by way of Angelina gun and the third by the Evangeline St. Clare river, while the glandelinians went slowly up the valleys. After many skirmishes in mountain passes and on hill tops the glandelinians managed to detain a portion of Viviana's army at Maldon gun Gap in a not most heavy skirmish, while Darger with his main army of troops hasten through other secret gaps and not on hill passage ways and crossing the Evangeline St. Clare took up a strong position between that big stream and the Erminia.

When general Viviana followed closely on a line of march thirty miles long, the rebels as soon as possible after fighting a thousand skirmishes retreated and soon took up a strongly defended defensive position beyond the Erminia. General Darger now decided and determined to make another attempt to capture Ozma by turning Viviana's right flank and left flank to gain his entire rear, and then going on rapidly to Angelina Agathia. General Darger partially succeeded in this flanking movement, and the two armies at once started southward one with the hope of reaching Ozma, the other with a determination to get a position where it could prevent the accomplishment of the purpose.

After a most exciting race, during which there were 10,000 skirmishes the Angelinian forces reached Barnes heights November the fifteenth and when a portion of Joseph Darger's army reached Rosa Station, Viviana attacked it and drove the glandelinians in wild confusion back to the Erminia, then after attempting to repair the railroads which the glandelinian armies destroyed on their ten mile retreat, followed him to Rosa Station, where another sharp battle occurred.

This point was protected by ten strong forts and long line lines of fortifications. On the north side was a line of fortifications with twenty two redoubts containing a force of two million men. Toward these the Angelinians turned their attention, general Rowland Wells directing an assault by his Abbeoninian divisions of Ninth Corps. After raging a fight of all day with varying fortunes on both sides the troops made a gallant charge in double line, and though nearly a million men were shot down in half an hour the survivors gallantly rushed into the ten mile line of rifle pits and forts in the face of a storm of grapeshot and bullets and shells and after a short but fierce hand to hand encounter or a hundred series of closing hand to hand encounters all along the line drove back the desperate defenders whose retreat was soon cut off by the Angelinians sweeping around to their many pontoon bridges. More than one million six hundred thousand glandelinians, and four hundred and forty four big guns were thus captured.

General Joseph Darger now fell back to another line of defenses on the banks of gunbeam Creek gun, behind the Erminia. A few weeks afterwards while the siege of the rest of the glandelinian army continued still fiercer general Viviana on December the twenty sixth decided to make an attempt to dislodge general Joseph Darger's main army. General Germania gibbons was sent forward on ahead with with an immense force of Conventinian Conventinians and upon reaching the vicinity of the long line of defenses he with a large escort made a personal reconnaissance which he and twenty thousand of his men including thirty general generals and all his officers with him were killed or wounded the general being wounded mortally. General General Kenneth Josie who took his command then having made his own plans resolved to make an attack the next morning if possible, but he lost time in manœuvring in unknown parts of the country the several days with nothing accomplished. Then general Viviana decided after hearing general Josie's reports to make a general assault on the fortifications at seven thirty o'clock the next morning but at daybreak while snow fell heavily it was found that general Darger and his Uncle had entirely changed their lines during the previous two days and nights and was so strongly fortified as to make the chances of success extremely doubtful. It also looked positive that Darger was preparing to go into winter quarters right there or await the main forces of the rebels army in the still more distant camps beyond.

In the same time while the siege of Angelina Agathia was in full swing and while to the the battles around her and at other various points were being fought so desperately, feeling the complete necessity of a larger force to carry on the wicked rebellion, the glandelinian Congresses who had charged of the loyal sections of Galverinia if you please to mention our authorized draft, or a complete forced conscription to fill up the ranks of the wicked glandelinian armies in Galverinia, and the king and other high persons immediately put it into operation.

This not indeed met with the opposition of the parts of Galverinia which was loyal to Angelina and who was opposed to the glandelinian cause. The loud and thrilling speeches of the thousands of leaders of these parties, and the utterance of the press in sympathy with them all against the draft, so inflamed the population of loyal Galverinia that in many cities even in possession of the glandelinians they rose in tremendous mobs and entered into one of the most tremendous and bloodiest riots ever seen on September the nineteenth 1914.

For the man and his wife, my dear reader, the Galverinians who were opposed to the enemy and the glandelinian draft created a most terrible disturbance. For the distance of six hundred miles they destroyed the long lines of telegraph wires, ruined thousands of railroad trains, tore up the tracks, burned down the tribunal buildings, paraded the streets of towns and cities with horrible cries against the glandelinian draft, and plundered and even killed the glandelinian citizens or those who did not oppose the glandelinian cause.

Innocent children who were claimed to be too strongly guarded by the rebels to be ever rescued were taken by force, secret or by kidnapping and sent to Abyssinian countries to be free, and the glandelinians who pursued or tried to regain the children were clubbed shot or cut down or hung by the necks on lamp posts trees, or from cornices of building roofs, and a large plantations for slave children was fiercely attacked and burned to the ground with every thing in the fields ruined, while the fleeing rebel inmates were pursued and captured or killed and the children carried off put on trains and sent off to Abbeonnia.

Many glandelinians who were child slave masters or who owned child slaves, had to fly for their lives into the country or into the enemy armies for protection. Nothing whatever could suppress the insurrection and when Christian armies were mustered into that section the rebels all had to go and the draft was overthrown. Fully two hundred thousand persons mostly of the glandelinian citizens police and soldiers were killed and property to the amount of at least $200,000,000 was destroyed. Again it was at this very time near Angelina Agathia during the siege that general John M. Fisher Clayton the worse of the Gargoylian guerrilla chiefs made one of his most famous raids around the whole rear of Angelina Agathia. He went swiftly and unexpectedly from one part of the Christian line to another, plundering, destroying and even levying contributions. His purpose was to give the main signal for the uprising of the very Angelinian garrison in that very city.

But however he was completely unsuccessful, and he and his whole band was soon captured in southern part of the region of Porothy Gale, late in October. The remainder of his big band of Gargoylians, were killed captured or dispersed. A brilliant exploit, probably one of the most brilliant exploits in the whole world was performed simultaneously by a large troop of Angelinian and Abbeoninian cavalry general I. W. W. Goodlaw with the assistance of go general polerino mic-holleston. They were sent by general Geneontinian Aronburg to destroy a portion of the Mic-Holleston and Pandora railroad in the western section of Angelinia Agay Athia and so successfully did these troops with the co. and of their two generals conduct the raid, that they almost entirely cleared that portion of the country of the glandelinians and seriously interrupted all railroad communication between general Adelo-De-Garbo near Angelinia Agathia, and Beppo Beppo Evans in front of Hedda Rann. And also plans to mention after the battle of Hedda Rann. He had to run the two opposing armies of Hanson, Vivian and Beppo Evans happened to be within a few miles of one another until December 1914. In the meantime the main cavalry forces of both sides were being extremely busy. The glandelinian cavalry early in October to November continually sent out millions of men and a force of four million horsemen the "Hooded Terror", under general Hart Broadway, and Boobyville Hedda to recapture Mombi Junction. But they failed and were soon driven back. When general Huesbaum, Stanek Mic-Wind Whirler the most famous glandelinian general of the war with a large force of all sorts of Gargoylians, added with Gargoylians and other kind of cavalry troops attempted to seize general Hanson's main base of supplies at Vincentini n gun, just below Boca and Dorothy Gale, in the month of October just before the battle of Hedda Rann, but was attacked and defeated by general Jack Ambrose Evans. General Huesbaum Mic-Wind Whirler then went back to the main army and getting reinforcements, reappeared near at Vincentinian Run early in October last week place please, for the purpose of section of seizing that place and was able to go on and reinforce general Beppo Evans and help him recapture Mombi. But in the battle that followed November the fourth place with the Angelinian forces under general Henry Joseph podger, he was seriously defeated and he was forced to retire to Hookerine Junction. Meanwhile general Hanson Vivian was not idle either. In the latter part of the beautiful month of December he sent out an expedition to Ozma in the hope of taking Ozma King town near there where the besieging glandelinians had secured or captured a large iron works and ammunition factories and some vast encampments of military stores, and also Pollychrome the set centre of a most important system of railroads.

The expedition was led by two generals and by Colonel Henry Hurmerson and left Dorothy Gale in the three hundred and eighty five Immense steamers for port St John from whence the big army of troops marched over to the Hurmer river and up that stream toward Polly Chrome, where the whole force was mounted on horses secured on the way, when they turned in another direction and moved eastward through one into Melder Glen in the rear of general Beppo's Immense army of glandelinians.

Indeed they were getting well on their way to their destination, when a body of Gargoylian cavalry under general Rodney Aronburg and August Darger, set out in swift pursuit of them. One of the liveliest races in the world ensued and it was ended only by the giving out of the horses of the Angelinian soldiers, and ammunition when they were within a few miles of Little Polly Chrome. The pursuers then fell upon them on December the third, and the condition of the Angelinian forces then compelled them to surrender. Colonel Hurmerson and his men were then sent to glandelinia, from which he after two months there, with a thousand other officers and a hundred generals afterwards escaped by burrowing themselves out under ground and in disguise getting back into Angelinia on a train.

General Hanson Vivian prepared to press on his advantage after his victory at Hedda Rann and so organized his main army into three divisions commanded respectively by general Raymond Hanson, general Jacob Baldwin and others, with the intention of moving on to Kittens Ischerts and force the enemy to break back from that location and thus break the siege by main force. This movement began late in December starting from Hedda Rann. General Beppo Evans left his entrenchments on the line of the Erminie Creek at the same time and fell back to Flathead Creek, then finding that general Hanson's Immense army was pressing up, and a portion of it seriously menacing his flank, he quickly retreated from there toward Quadding country to closely pursued. Passing over the hills near Mount Munch, general Beppo Evans, crossed the Winkie river and North Branch creek at the town of Bridge port, destroying sixteen big bridges as he went and setting a forest on fire for the distance of two miles and half filling the region with a sea of smoke in his effort to frustrate Hanson's purpose.

The army of Hansons reached the Winkie river on the twelfth of December 1914, when general Beppo Evans was concentrated near Munchkin town. General Hanson whose main army was further behind soon saw that that town and the rebel positions supported by Hanson's main line was too strong a position to be taken by a direct attack, so he made up his mind to attempt to flank it by the west and south and gain the rear of the vast glandelinian army and break the peril of Angelinia Agathia right there. And where he felt sure he could also cut off the rebel general from his main base of supplies and compels him to retreat or give battle. With this plan in view, general Hanson Vivian took the corps of general Jack Ambrose Evans, and Walter John Jennings across the W Winkie river a few miles below Mount Munch and went up the Munchkin valley and took possession of that hill. Then the rest of the army under general Richard Johnston Kindernine and Rio Hardeon Patrick Halsted was left with orders to so arrange itself that the enemy would think the whole force was still on the north shore of the Winkie river. These orders were indeed so well carried out, that general Beppo Evans was thoroughly deceived, and knew nothing whatever of general Hanson's purpose or of the movement of his army until the latter had moved a portion of his vast army far north of him. Beppo immediately saw the danger of being cut off from his base of supplies and so at once broke up his Immense camp and within two days after a hundred and fifty severe skirmishes evacuated Emerald town and his positions and passed through the country and hilly region to Kittens Ischerts, which danger also caused general Adelo-De-Garbo to evacuate all other positions northward and west of Mombi and Kittens Ischerts and move northward to reinforce general Beppo Evans. When general Hanson Vivian heard of Beppo Evans' retreat his Immense army indeed was scattered. General Jack Evans' big corps was fourteen miles away up the Quadding country, general John Evans' big brothers army was down the Aronburgs gun valley, the thirteen miles back, while general Jennings and Halsted and Kindernine was on the Erminie Creek only eight miles from Mombi. General Hanson Vivian supposing general Beppo Evans to be in full retreat near or toward Polly Chrome and slippy town and not thinking that Adelo-De-Garbo was moving to his aid, ordered Kindernine, Grotheart, and Jennings, and also Halsted to move up the Winkie river and take position at Hurmer's Gai General mill, where three or four roads from Polly Chrome to Dorothy Gale and Ozma crossed, so as to intercept the fleeing glandelinian army before he reached Adelo-De-Garbo's centre. Just then to his surprise general Hanson Vivian learned from boyscouts and girlscouts belonging to Gertrude Angelina's force that general Beppo Evans was not at all retreating as he had supposed but had turned about with half of Garbo's army to his support and was preparing to march back on Emerald town.

Hanson was startled and to save Kindernine and his four great general generals if possible from destruction by Beppo Evans general Germaine and Jimmie Vivian were ordered to push on with all haste over the hilly country to their support. General Beppo Evans learned of this movement and at once sent general Ah Annie Wad and Jinger snap to fighting forest, though through which general Kindernine and his followers would have to pass, so as to hold the latter and allow general Adelo-De-Garbo's advancing army to fall upon the isolated positions of these four Christian commanders. For a good reason which was on account of Gertrude Angelina's boy and girl scouts neither of these movements of the enemy was able to catch the four Christian generals who were able to push through despite opposition and push down the valley while general Germaine Vivian and the others appeared and came to their help. General Raymond Hanson was then ordered to come up to general Robert Vivian's support on the extreme right, and at midnight his columns were in motion. By taking a most indirect route down Munchkin gun valley and across the three other streams he managed to elude an Immense body of Zimmermannian Confederates sent to intercept him. While action was going on at the Munchkin and Winkie stream already and the sound of firing was wild and heavy general Hanson Vivian soon concentrated his vast armies near Augustine St. Clare Creek as much as possible and on the following morning still all night having heard firing of great intensity the army stretched along the Aug Augustine St. Clare Creek from Hurmer's Gai General mill, toward the location of Glinda Junction with Jack Ambrose Evans on the left, Kindernine in the centre, and general Jennings on the right. The immense army of Adele-De-Garbes and Beppo Evans was arranged on the opposite side of the creek. The tremendous battle of August 18th at Clara Creek or Polly Chorn opened fearfully this very morning of December the twenty fourth. General James Gignery was the one to receive the first main blow. He with general Henry Darger had been sent with a large force of pomobians and Abbeannians and many officers from the main christian line to make a powerful reconnoitre toward the Winkie river, when the glandelinians who consisted of the fierce and dreaded Omarians opened the attack upon him. His whole line was fearfully assailed by the glandelinians under generals Henry Wailen, Mic-Holleston Phelan and Augustus and James Darger and he was rapidly being worsted. The divisions of general Gignery, but so severe was the violent assault of the insurgents that they soon were compelled to fall back rapidly to the centre of the main christian line, and general Beppo Evans seemed soon to be rapidly gaining his purpose to strike at the whole of general Hanson's line from left right and centre in an endeavor to wind some weapon or undetected spot, and break through to sweep a back the whole christian line and capture Angelina Agatha when general Jack Ambrose Evans came up and rallying the broken and shattered divisions of Gignery and Darger, hurled them upon the whole line of the assaulting enemy. When drawing all his columns into position again, general Ambrose Evans ordered his whole line and the troops of the others to advance. Presenting a whole determined and irresistible front, the Angelinian troops extending in a six mile line of battle rushed forward steadily and firmly, and although general Phelan's men stood their ground bravely for a long time and fought most desperately every inch of ground they could not long resist the heavy human tide of christian christian forces that swept down upon them in serried waves of attack. Forced back all along the line with their line cut to pieces and two generals fallen they wheeled their deadly batteries into new positions and hurled a tornado of shot and shell, and grape and canister into the whole line of the advancing christian force, but all in vain. The whole advancing christian surge of course was fairly torn in tatters, but steadily the christian soldiers advanced, breaking the head of each column of desperate glandelinians as it tried in vain to stop them, and sweeping over everything like a cyclone until the field was fairly won and the glandelinians had been driven back for nearly six miles. While the fearful battle was raging so violently on the main line the Angelinian centre was assailed by general Adl Adele-De-Garbes and Bernard Gunn Nolkingsburg with such ardour and resistance and a vehemence that the whole centre was quickly forced back and was about to break into confusion and retreat in total rout when general J.O. Evans who was on the right grand division division, came up with his big force of troops and stemmed the current for an hour.

But after a most sanguinary storm of battle for an hour and when it seemed evident that the Angelinian rebels would be driven back at last fresh glandelinians immediately appeared and rushed into the fray so wildly, and fiercely and attacked the Angelinians so savagely that the whole christian line was parted in the middle, and the immense torrent of gimmermannian assailants looking like little girls attacking boys managed to push on into the vast east gap thus made and almost turned the rear of the christian line. Seventy christian generals fell in their endeavor to restore the broken line and for a moment or so it seemed evidently as if the glandelinians had fairly gained the day, but general Ambrose Evans came up just then, and while general Robert Vivian held the enemy in check with a dreadful annihilating cannon fire, that destroyed every rebel column that dared to rush in the face of it general Jackson Evans divisions and ten brigades came up, and after counter charging and then holding its own line of battle in a perfect inferno of cannon and musketry managed to at last drive the advancing gimmermannian columns back with dreadful losses.

This success was only for a brief spell for general Leo Costello's artillery stormed general Vivian's long line of batteries thus giving the shattered shattered gimmermannian columns a chance to rally, and receiving reinforcements from general Leo Costello's left wing they again came on and rushed forward with terrific fury. General Jackson's army now had to fall back and in striving to rally the line he was wounded and his assistant general Daniel L. Turner killed.

His retreat however was soon stopped by general Mic-Holleston, who with small pioneer companies and William Jackson's brigades and two ninth and eighth and ninth corps turned the tide again in favor of the Angelinians. The general Gignery and his two generals found themselves forced to give way under an attack of great ferocity, that beginning at the extreme left wing of the christian line had drifted and drifted rapidly down the whole line just as a wave sweeps along the shore, but these three generals and their divisions were saved in time by the Abbeannians and Abyssinkilians under generals Kenneth Casey, and James Gannon who coming down the two streams in great haste, charged furiously upon the sixteen mile long line of glandelinian assailants attacking them both on front and in the flank and driving them back to their main line in utter rout. The two immense armies now stood face to face without either side having gained much advantage. But nevertheless general Beppo Evans had been foiled and frustrated in every attempt to break general Robert Vivian's main line, and toward nightfall he withdrew his forces to prepare for still another desperate struggle on the coming morning. The whole christian army however under the two Vivians rested in a very uneasy form that night. The two immense christian divisions had suffered awful losses in men and officers during the day and at no point had anything been gained. Both sides still retained their respective positions, and although the troops were all tired out by the wild struggle and thirsty because of having been driven from the three water courses, they knew they would have to fight out the battle more desperately in the morning. But nevertheless they had the satisfaction of knowing that only the indomitable bravery of their officers and of themselves, had saved their army from total defeat, and possibly from capture.

Indeed the glandelinians too were very unhappy and uneasy over the dreadful day's work. Their gallant and desperate struggle to get past the whole christian line under the two Vivians and recover general Evans had come to naught, and they must repeat their efforts the next morning. But the gloom that settled upon their camp was somewhat dispelled by the appearance in the night of general Joseph Henry Darger with the balance of his own corps that had been sent by Adele-De-Garbes from the region of Omaha down to the assistance of Beppo Evans, so that the latter army was increased to seventy million men. While General Hanson Vivian and his brother had at this point only sixty five million men. The next morning Christmas day the battle broke out again in redoubled force and violence with a fierce attack than the day before upon general Jack Ambrose Evans' position.

The glandelinians advancing in two immense serried lines so close on like two successive tidal waves, and though their line was riddled and torn by the terrific christian fire, they made a gallant determined charge, and although a part of Evans' main line was protected by a strong rude breastwork, and abatis made of all kinds of trees and interlocked with discarded utensils of every kind, and manned by many parks of artillery which seemed to sweep all before it, and from whose infantry line poured an incessant stream of bullets, the survivors pushed on, rapidly filling the huge gaps and the places of so many of those who fell under the hot withering fire. Even as column after column melted away fresh troops sprang forward, their leaders being determined to carry the christian position and stop the deadly fire at any cost. Twenty glandelinian generals along this point fell killed in a short time, and men and horses and even whole lines of charge fairly went down like a massacre but nevertheless the glandelinians pressed the attack more fiercely and general Evans was so hard pressed that general Hanson Vivian sent Gignery and Henry Darger to his aid, filling the latter place with Abyssinkilian divisions of general Ben Logan's divisions. The struggle was now more desperate and seeing the christian troops being reinforced the remaining glandelinian generals headed by Joseph Henry Darger and Augustus Darger urged the men on to a last desperate and more violent assault. So well they did the whole line of gimmermannians respond to the appeal, that reckless of death, and despite the volcano of flame and din along the whole Abbeannian line that shook the ground like an earthquake and wailed the whole region in a sea of smoke and flame they dashed up into the very mouths of guns and cannons that sent whole brigades to annihilation, and broke the solid main christian columns in front of them, and engaging them in a tumult of bayonets and shots point blank finally hurled them back in confusion.

In vain did general Jack Evans tried to prop up the tottering broken and mangled columns with his presence and appeals, one by one they trembled and then crumbled before that restless storm until the whole wing fell back in disorder and general Henry Dargers was wounded on the right leg and shoulder by a shell fragment.

The whole line retreated general Evans clever as he was hastily sought another strong position and finding it managed after two hours effort to rally the many divisions of broken troops behind it, and another desperate stand was soon made.

On general Brooktown, Herdrude and Kindernine were wounded, general Turner was killed, garring was wounded and also polerine Mic-Hollester. General Hanson Vivian now ordered general Glide Quimble to leave his own position in the centre and join General Jack Evans who was the hardest pressed in general Robert Vivians whole roaring battle line. To do this general Glide Quimble had to pass around in the rear of general Viviania who was also fearfully engaged, and who stood between him and Evans. Always on the look out for some weak spot in the main christian line the glandelinian immernannians quick as a flash, saw the gap made by the sudden departure of Glide Quimble, and without a moments delay on, called upon their allies the Mic-Hollesterians and Scoodlers, and sprang into it. Here was a fearful death struggle in two directions at once, the glandelinians in passing through the gap facing two fires of front and rear, and then encountering a fearful inflade and general germania Vivian who moved quickly from the right to prevent the rush into the gap was swept aside like a reed and without ceremony and himself dangerously wounded and six of his generals killed, and all his commanders swept down to death and ruin, while the army on the left and right side of the gap shared the same horrible fate and general Henry Goodchild and Anotone genguine fell wounded.

General goncentinian J Jacksonia Evans and general Maurice gostellio who had come from the right near Betsy phlin rallied his troops and for a while stood his ground obstinately against the greatest odds. But charging on reckless of losses and despite fiercer resistance the zimernannians and Mic-Hollesterians swept everything before them. General Robert Vivian himself, and Hanson Vivian, and Jimmie Vivian and also Viviania and Francis Viviananna were all borne backwards with dreadful loss unable to breast the storm tide, and their troops in the biggest rout and confusion ever witnessed fled like a nation stricken with panic to the helter of the outer provinces of Dorothy Gale. General Jack Evans main left wing was now completely left alone on the fearful battle field, and he determined to make a stand and save the army and Dorothy Gale from ruin and capture if possible. Gathering his own broken armies on a big semicircular ridge the one called Mt Mun h Munc h his whole line was rallied after an hours desperate effort, and soon the mount seemed to have been a large series of big volcanoes broken out into his thundering eruptions as his whole army poured broadside after broadside five miles long of thousands of cannon and millions of musketry into the wild insane masses of immernannians and Mic-Hollesterians, who flushed with their victory on other parts of the field bore down upon him with the greatest fury. Bravely the Angelinians stood their ground, and bravely their enemies rushed to the attack. But the good and well chosen post position of general Jack Evans and his well directed incessant galling fire were too much for even the bravest of men, and the fierce glandelinian charge was soon checked. Falling back they finally decided to assail the Angelinians on their main flanks. In one dark mass many miles long they gradually swung around like the wave does at the change of wind during a storm and moved fiercely around on general Evans right and poured through the gore in his rear like a dreadful flood with the effect of causes. General Jacksonia Evans shuddered for he believed now that all was up with him and his army. In a few minutes all his whole immense army would be killed or captured, for he had no force to check the desperate onslaught on the right and rear. But fortunately just at the critical moment general Peppo Evans of the Angelinian Army under general Mror Viviania who had heard of the desperate peril of general Evans and moved to his support from his position at a distance six miles away arrived with the sixteen brigades of general Antonio Viviania and Michael Caset under the command of general Baldwin Phelan. Not a second too soon did they arrive, general Joseph Henry Dargers attacking rebel troops were already pressing on and but in a victory, when general Michael Caset seizing the regimental colors led the ten brigades and other columns in a gallant counter charge against them. Like a roaring cyclone they swept down upon the conquering foe, and fairly blew it from the ridge and hills. Once more the christians under general Jack Evans were secure in their position.

However general Dargers glandelinian troops were rallied at once and charged again upon the ridge with redoubled fury only to be driven back by the most deadly fire of cannon and musketry. Again and again, and at all again they returned to the attack but were swept back with horrible slaughter. Then they tried a most desperate advance upon the left in double line of tremendous charge but were routed by a bayonet charge led by general Baldwin Phelan. He afternoon was now fast advanced and still the battle raged on with Beppo Da Evans and Jack Evans. Soon the day was fast closing and the fierce glandelinians rallied for a decisive blow. General Jack Evans ammunition was exhausted, and he had nothing to stop this last assault upon his lines but the bayonet. So when the foe came on and reaching striking distance he shouted:

"Give those yelling devils the cold steel. go anything in your power to stop them."

forgetting their desperate weariness and the seriousness of their situation, his long lines of men sprang forward and charged so quickly and so steadily that the glandelinians finally turned and fled in confusion and the left wing of general Hanson Vivians army was saved.

To go to general Robert Vivians army. The engagement along his line was equally as severe and violent and during this most important battle general Vivian and his staff looked in vain for hours anxiously for reinforcements from Hanson or Viviania as his immense line of gallant troops from their slight time to time saw the breastworks of snow, logs, sapinacks, sand bags, and from ridges of dead soldiers were striving desperately to repulse the repeated assaults of the overwhelming Scoodler, zimernannian and Mic-Hollesterian forces and save his whole army from destruction. His whole line of battle was formed like a narrow long angle with general Remington standard on the main left wing, having under him generals Joseph Gater, Daniel S. Shoemannia and Marcus Nero; Joseph Violette and Henry Goodchild held the extreme right at Whukie Creek and Gordon Child gave p, plantation. General Roswell Johnson ten army corps consisting of general Puggy Mullanes and Van Brooklinas divisions formed the main centre with part of general Jimmie Vivians on each side. The line generally followed Winkie Creek though on the left it happened to take the course of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora Railroad. Between eleven o'clock and twelve o'clock general Mic-powels Jones brigades of general John Posters division met the first attack at this section of the bloody battle and in two hours his whole division was pressed back. General Robert Vivian then ordered his own line to advance and general Adele De-Garbe who led the glandelinian onslaught against Robert Vivian was driven back with the greatest slaughter losing two miles of ground and immense numbers of cannons and positions he had gained, and his immense corps were fast melting away under the tremendous blows of Robert Vivian, when general Double Day Federal Johnston and Zimmermann Mic-Whirther threw their corps and other divisions with awful impetuosity on Roswell Johnsons troops, and after a fierce struggle in which losses on both sides was whole wholesale routed him and drove to the right in similar disorder and panic Puggy Mullanes divisions of Brooklinas army leaving here a wide gap in the main line, and exposing general Robert Vivian to a heavy flank attack. Back ther his own victorious troops turned returned to meet the new enemy and general Robert Vivian with Joseph Gater and Daniel Shoemannia from the right, rallying some of the routed and crushed centre drove the enemy back with dreadful loss in men and officers. Before the deadly annihilating fire of this new christian line the glandelinians everywhere retired and before the afternoon was well advanced general Robert Vivian had still his held his old line.

During the short lull general Vivian hastily fell back to a new line resting with his main right wing on W. Remond Creek. The fight happened to recommence on the extreme right and the glandelinians about two o'clock in the afternoon attacked Henry Goodchild with all their strength. At the time the new centre of the christian position were under generals Remington standard, Joseph Carter, and the left being under generals Marcus Hero, Joseph Violette and Roswell Jos Johnson. Again general Adele-De-Garbo rolled his his immense tidal wave on General Robert Vivians whole line and again a most bitterly contested fight took place. At last general Brooklines troops began to give way, and general Carter was immediately sent with his army to his relief. As general Remington moved forward to fill general Carters place, the glandelinians under general Melden convention took them in the flank and routed and scattering them covered general Robert Vivians line, leaving him with generals Violette, H. Henry Goodheart, and Roswell Johnson cut off entirely from the main mass of his army. So general Vivian was compelled to gather up the other portion of the army in a strong line on Betsey Cobbin Heights and prepared to resist the last desperate glandelinian attack, made indeed with all the inspiration of victory, but his men finally stood firm, and a cloud of dust to the left and right soon showed a line advancing on the Pandora road. Every eye indeed was strained, a moment would tell whether the days dre adful disaster must close in irreparable ruin or there was yet hope of repulsing the wild onslaught of the foe. It was the advance of general Conscientin Aronburg with his fresh troops which now rushed on the enemy, and drove them from all the positions they had gained, and thus aided general Robert Vivian kept repulsing repulsing the enemy until he himself was wounded and then despite the help of Conscientin Aronburg fell back in confusion with his whole army fell back in confusion and was routed.

The most tremendous part of general Conscientin Aronburgs action was the repulse and check of the main line of the enemy under Adele-De-Garbo whose christian army with the separation of General Vivians on account of the disorder and retreat was separated from the glandelinian surge by a long stone wall and a wide field. Their daring and most heroic resistance to the overwhelming force of attack was never surpassed, hundreds of thousands of them climbing the stone fences to meet the rebels as they rushed madly upon the army under Conscientin Aronburg. They even had the whole Gargoylian and other parts of the main glandelinian cavalry, artillery and immense divisions of infantry to fight for four hours but not withstanding this vast odds the whole line held the position until general Jack Evans who had repulsed his own assailants was able to send to Conscientin Aronburg who was slightly wounded in the left hand. Conscientin Aronburg advanced army went into the battle with six million three hundred and thirty three thousand men, and came out with only nine hundred and sixty three thousand or less than one quarter of their number while Conscientin Aronburgs main army was half an mile away and only reached his battered little column when the big battle was over.

The next following night general Conscientin Aronburg and Evans withdrew from the disastrous field and joined the balance of the army which had fallen back totally defeated to the outer works of Angelina Agathia and Porothy Gale. The victory of the glandelinians at Augustine St. Clare Creek cost them about 41,000,000 men in killed and wounded and about 21,000,000 men in disabled and prisoners. General Hanson Vivian lost about 19,000,000 or nearly one third of his splendid army. Evans lost 10,000,000 men, Robert Vivian lost five million and Conscientin Aronburg about one million killed and four million wounded, while the rest were taken prisoners. Besides this the whole christian army engaged lost one thousand three hundred and thirty six guns of immense size, 10,000 caissons, and eight million, four hundred and fifty thousand small arms.

The total loss of the christian army in killed and wounded was thirty nine million while they lost exactly five million in prisoners. One of the many incidents of the tremendous battle as the daring exploit of Penrod and seventeen of his boy scout and girl scout friends, along which were with him, Violet and her sisters, Gertrude Angeline and her friends Jennie Turner and Angelina Riches. During the tremendous confusion and rout of the christian troops under Robert Vivian he and his girl and boy friends had become separated and lost in the path of the enemy and separated from the retreating christian soldiers, after taking part in the thickest of the fight in scout signals and so on, and were riding on their horses to join them when the rebel pursuers fired a volley and unhorsed them all, wounded some of the boys and Violet herself in the hand. At once the rebels were upon them and the glandelinian general in the lead of Dauntless Puritan rode up at the head of his column and seeing the fugitives escaping on foot across a wooded field shouted to the men "Stop you little christian devils!" The fugitives therefore came to a standstill and waited for the general and his party of fifty pursuers came up. As they did so the fugitives stepped behind trees swiftly drew their little weapons and taken taking aim began firing, and soon had wounded the general and shot down all his party of men and officers. The little girls and boys then escaped from the main body of glandelinians and reached Porothy Gale all excited, and Penrod and some of his comrades for saving the Vivian girls were rewarded by promotion to lieutenants and captains.

When the main forces of Angelinian soldiers defeated at Pop Polly Chrome or Augustine St. Clare Creek fell back toward Porothy Gale its position soon became very precarious for the besieging glandelinians by arranging themselves upon all the ridges around the region and placing themselves upon the lost christian positions at Jennie's Bridge Ferry, and Hellertonic and Herod Junction which commanded all the approaches to the four rivers mentioned in this siege managed to completely cut off all its main supplies from those directions. Then by a series of great raids they destroyed several scores of thousands of wagon loads coming from other directions, and seriously damaged all the railroads between Angelina Agathia and Galverine so that it was not exactly for a time that all the communications of the christian army was destroyed, and a general retreat from Porothy Gale and Angelina Agathia became inevitable. At general Hanson Vivian determined to hold Angelina Agathia and all its other points and at once took measures to relieve the distress of the troops there under his brother. The main armies of Abyssinkilians and Abhisannians constituting the Military divisions of the Conscientinians were consolidated and at this point general Jennie Vivian was placed in the main command. When he arrived at Porothy Gale general Jennie Vivian made his friend general Jackson Evans the main leader of the first named christian army, and general Jack Evans of the latter, general Hanson Vivian having been compelled to leave Angelina Agathia and go north to take command of an immense christian army preparing for the defense of Angelina St. Clare. In order to prepare the main way for a desperate attack upon the besieging glandelinian positions on Hellertonic Junction it was found necessary to get possession of Jennie's Bridge Ferry three miles below the location of the Junction and thus to make possible a direct dislodgment of the rebels from the south side of the Winklesun river. After a dangerous reconnaissance by general Jennie Vivian and Jack Ambrose Evans, the chief Abyssinkilian military engineer general Toney Wallenburg was sent with four thousand men to seize it. So on the night of January the twenty seventh, 11,500 of the men specially picked out and led by general Jester Heller were placed in a long line of pontoons and immense flat boats and pushed out into the big stream down which they all managed to drift without the aid of any oars, around glandonia point in front of Hellertonic Junction. They soon made a landing, and while the many boats were rowed across the river at many points to a point where stood the balance of the forty thousand troops, who had secretly marched thither by land, a strong position to resist the now completely alarmed enemy was secured.

Indeed when the whole force had disembarked, a portion of the glandelinian army retreated up the nearest valley and the Angelinians immediately took the opportunity of building a number of pontoon bridges that soon spanned the river at sixteen places and opened a way for reinforcements and supplies. General Sigmond Aronburg who was near Kittens rd. Marching watching the rebel line there was was now ordered by general Jimmie Vivian to advance to the Hollertonic Valley please and manure general Adele-De-Garbes plan and also to protect the passage of supplies up the two riverways. He started off at once and took up a position at Wauh Ha from which the glandelinians fiercely attempted to dislodge him before daylight on the morning of January the nineteenth. The attacked attack opened against general Rodney Graves main position and he was soon hard pressed by overwhelming numbers of Zimmermanians and was indeed so hard pressed that general Aronburg ordered ordered general picknell Henton's divisions of general Gorman's Vivian's main corps to his aid. On the way this immense division was surprised by a sudden and deadly fire of musketry and a cannon from the hills and the river banks near by and from what appeared to be a long line of howitzers. A large brigade under general Henry partridge was at once detached to charge the heights, while the other kept on toward Sigmond Aronburg. Another brigade under general Gorman's Galton from general Alexander's Jambo's division of corps which just then came up was ordered to carry the snow forts by storm. He indeed did so with the bayonet after six desperate charges in the face of a fire of twenty two million muskets and a thousand cannon, one division moving up the heights and the other against the snow fort positions and through wooded region toward the river covered with underbrush, and lined with gullies and ravines. General Aronburg also had a most heavy struggle against overwhelming numbers but being reinforced and the men being cheered by the presence of general Rodney Graves in the most critical place the glandelinians were at length driven away to the shelter of Hollertonic junction after a three or four hours terrific battle in the darkness and in a pouring snowstorm. During the desperate contest about twenty two thousand miles and horses panic stricken by the dreadful noise of musketry and cannon and by their millions of flashes dashed into the ranks of the glandelinians, and the fierce Zimmermanians supposing it to be a charge of general Rodney Graves troops, fell back in utmost confusion for a moment.

Meanwhile general Gust Knox was making rapid progress in his own efforts to expel the Glandelinians from the valley of Winkle river. He had taken possession of a rebel position in front of Porothy Gale and was about to move on and join Jimmie Vivian at Junction Hill, when just after the battle of Augustine St. Clare Creek, general Adele-De-Garbes sent general Beppo Evans to the valley to make another effort to capture Porothy Gale (The poor child). General Knox then intrenched himself in the region of that fortified city and at the middle of December was regularly besieged there with the other Angelinian armies there by general Beppo Evans. The siege continued all until the close of the month there being struggles and heavy cannonades of great violence, when the arrival of a portion of Jimmie Vivian's army under general Arob Aronburg and Ginkale St. Clare sent to general Knox's relief drove general Beppo Evans into a most rapid retreat toward Kittens rd. Marching. General Jimmie Vivian now determined to take advantage of general Beppo Evans' retreat by an attack upon general Adele-De-Garbes in person. He ordered general Jack Ambrose Evans to attack general Garbes' left grand division on Hollertonic Junction. General Jacksonia Evans was directed to cross the Winkle river a little above Porothy Gale (Poor child) and strike Adele-De-Garbes right, on Pickens ridge. General Jack Evans therefore moved very rapidly on the morning of January the twenty fourth, with great skill and still greater celerity he fought his way up the steep rugged sides of the rebel positions. It was another tremendous battle and so fierce was the fire of the rebel line of musketry and cannon that it seemed for a while as if Evans' army was pushing an attack through a sea of clouds as the thick smoke concealed his whole line of attack from view, phew.

The scene was indeed one of most exciting interest to any one who would have witnessed it. The thick fog of smoke which before rested in dense folds upon the sides of the onerous steep positions concealing the long lines of combatants from view was soon temporarily blown aside by a strong breeze suddenly rising roaring to the anxious eyes gaze of millions in the grounds below in the valley and other lands below a scene such as was never witnessed in any battle field before. General Rodney Graves' columns a x miles long, flushed with with a sweeping victory, grappled with the foe upon the long rocky ledges of their positions and drove the glandelinians back with dreadful slaughter from the long line of works. While the result was uncertain the attention was indeed most breathless and painful and also impatient but when victory finally perched upon the Angelinian standards, shot after shot from millions of voices suddenly rent the air. The whole army with one grand accord broke out in all kinds of joyful exclamations and the enthusiasm of the whole scene was beyond any description whatever got a nigger.

All the men were frantic with joy indeed and the Christian generals themselves did not think men could ever accomplish so much against such a strong glandelinian position. The glandelinians at all points that night fled from the region of Hollertonic Run or Junction to the Winkle valley and joined the main army and their main commander on Poroid Junction a mile away. General Jacksonia Evans having crossed the Winkle river was now on a position on the northern edge of the Pickens ridge and soon after dawn on January the twenty fifth the main attack on general Adele-De-Garbes' main concentrated forces began. General Jacksonia Evans' troops had to push through a steep valley before reaching the position in which the enemy was posted. General horse leading the advance in person gained a firm foothold on the west side of this long hill and others quickly followed and a most terrific fire of musketry and artillery for the extent of sixteen miles. Nobly they tried to reach the lofty rebel positions above and division after division was in eddies brought to their aid but in vain. He was shot, shell and canister added by grape and a terrific musketry storm kept the them back, although they held stubbornly to their own position. All morning the battle raged furiously at Poroid Junction. General Adele-De-Garbes thinking from Jacksonia's brave stand, that general Jack Evans intended to crush the glandelinian right and left at any cost withdrew a large force of his troops from his main center to use them in the aid of his defense against Jacksonia Evans. This movement both Jack Evans and Jimmie Vivian was hoping for and expecting. General pastor Heller who had hurried down from Hollertonic Junction after his victory there was immediately dispatched with six divisions under six generals to climb the main steep sides of the hills in front and attack general Adele-De-Garbes' main left. As the six divisions moved in steady columns toward the frowning heights the long line of artillery all along the crest of the Pickens ridge opened and poured a scathing fire through the Christian ranks. Still onward they pressed on without stopping or flinching. Reaching the hill or ridge they came face to face with a long line of rifle pits that sent forth a tremendous shower of destructive bullets. But this failed to stop the Christian advance. With fierce yells and a tremendous dash they sprang up and over into the ditch beyond. Then up the beautiful ridge they climbed slowly but steadily they ascended the long slope, while from above a fierce fire of musketry was poured added by rocks and stones and shells with lighted fuses which were rolled down upon them. General Jimmie Vivian from a most commanding point in front of the Pickens ridge known as the Pickens orchard, which general John Evans had captured and fortified three days before, watched his army move slowly upward, and with intense anxiety saw the murderous work of shot and shell and musketry hurled against it. At last the survivors of the brave soldiers reached the summit and like a purple wave dashed over the batteries, and with loud cheers managed to drive Adele-De-Garbes' army into hasty flight. They were pursued as far as Little Girlknool where after a sharper engagement the glandelinians fell back further to Big Girlknool. The Angelinians then returned to Porothy Gale and Jack Evans went to the relief of Porothy Gale. The Christian loss in this latter battle was about four million, while the rebels lost about three million one hundred thousand in killed and wounded and sixteen million in prisoners.

10) MIC-HOLLESTER TRIES TO INVADE THE DOMAINS OF DOROTHY GALE..

IN THE MEANTIME, in the early part of September 1915 at the very outbreak of the siege of Angelinia Agathia and while Manley had started his armies forward the Glandelinian government to insure the capture of Angelinia Agathia der determined to make a most strong effort to gain possession of both Dorothy Gale and Ooma. The most formidable barrier of the cities in the front of the Mic-Hollestonian, coloring fortifications to the accomplishment of this purpose was the immense two mile long fortress called Gertrude Hoffmann so on November the 26th Admiral Argin was sent with nineteen big monitor vessels vessels and fifty big gullboats and warships and a fleet of warships of different make to attack that big stronghold by water. At the same time general Henry Johnnie Johnston was sent to co-operate with him with a force of fourteen million four hundred thousand troops, who took a masked position on the mainland nearest the fort. But the daring expedition came to naught as the guns of Gertrude Hoffmann and the entire stretch of the Mic-Hollestonian coloring fortifications and the many big adjacent batteries opened such a terrific concentrated fire upon the whole half the number of his ships and many men. When two weeks later general Henry Shoeman Ambrose succeeded general Henry Joise in the command of the army in the south another and stronger expedition against fortress Gertrude Hoffmann and Dorothy Gale was planned immediately. It was arranged that one of the outlying fortresses of Mic-Hollestonian coloring Tarantille-Sicilienne, a mile back should be first seized, then its guns used in silencing fortress Gertrude Hoffmann and in destroying the city of Dorothy Gale, if that city and its immense mobilization and other camps and defence works was not surrendered. As Admiral did not approve of this still more desperate plan he was relieved early in December by general Adele-Du-Garbo.

The second expedition started in December on the tenth day maybe general Lifed Perry Higger was first sent with a force to grindale junction gun to attract the attention of the Glandelinian forces there, while general Shoeman Ambrose suddenly landed a large force of Glandelinian troops on the southern river bank near fortress Manton and forced the Angelinians there with the aid of batteries from Mombi, to the shelter of fortress Sicilienne.

After doing this general Ambrose planted batteries across the neck of lands near the junction of the river. Then on December the twentieth his forces made a furious attack upon the fortress, but being repulsed with frightful losses, a simultaneous bombardment by river artillery was determined on. So on the eighteenth of December a score of thousands of great guns opened on the fortress from batteries and the rebel fleets. At sunset the very same day general Ambrose's forces of Mic-Hollestonians which had been reinforced by general Henry James Joise joining him from Mombi Centre moved in seventeen monstrous columns to attack fort Sicilienne.

One column was led by general Zor Rae Estabrook, the other by general Zor Rae Camden, and as his brigade. The others were under various generals which would take too much time and paper to write down here but general Estabrook's divisions composed of the fifty-sixth Mic-Hollestonian brigade, under general Zor Rae, the Mic-Hollestonian columns, the Scudlers, the Omarians, the Mic-Hollestonians, the Kurds and the gargoyles infantry led the desperate assault. The whole seventeen columns extending in a long line dashed forward on the double quick, and passed through through a most awful storm of hot shell and grape from fort Gertrude Hoffmann, the fortifications of Dorothy Gale, and Sicilienne without flinching. Their losses were simply dreadful but the survivors soon gained the ditches and outer works before it, and after desperate fighting with the Christian infantry there drove them toward the fort, and crossing the ditches and outer works, they were mounting the Japanese line of parapets, when general Zor Rae's command of the rebels waved to his Glandelinian soldiers fall back, while the general of the garrison of Christian soldiers, general Wilber Wright was killed with general Franklin.

Still despite this defense of the Angelinians continued on with redoubled ferocity and the fire from the garrison and the Christian works beyond and from the fortifications of Dorothy Gale became so hot and deadly that every Glandelinian commander was killed or wounded, general Estabrook being killed.
So the seven Japanese columns torn to pieces, beat a hasty and disordered retreat.
General William Joise now rushed his forces which advanced and dashed into the same terrible storm of iron hail and destruction. They however gained the ramparts of the fortress, and after a fierce hand to hand encounter for the length of two miles managed to gain possession of a portion of the long fort but the whole assaulting line was completely shattered and exhausted and when general Johnnie Johnston fell mortally wounded it broke and fled back to its own entrenchments leaving the ground strewn for ten miles with their fields of dead and dying. The Angelinians having a special hatred for general William Joise because he had been guilty of the murder of thousands of little girls and boys, and nuns and priests pitched his body into the ditch outside the fortress with a lot of his dead Glandelinian soldiers. General Estabrook himself was so badly wounded that he died shortly afterward inside the fort where he had been taken when picked up. General Ambrose now saw that he could never capture fortress Sicilienne by direct assault of any force and so began a regular siege. At the same time he decided to bombard fortress Gertrude Hoffmann over the top sections of fortress Sicilienne. For this purpose he had to construct an immense battery in a line of hills half way between Dorothy Gale and Joise by driving piles into deep rocks and mud and placing platforms upon it. When general Ambrose ordered general Howard Stevens to attend to the construction of this immense battery the latter general told him such a thing would be completely impossible.

Impossible as the region was a complete morass of mud nearly twenty feet deep.
But the Glandelinian general declared there was no such a thing as impossible and the general Stevens at once made efforts to bridge this gulf of mud and form the battery.

The redoubt was soon built by bringing immense timber from the big lumber yards in possession of the foe a distance of ten miles in rafts and lumber boats.
The rafts and immense lumber boats were floated to their places at night, and the immense piles driven into the mud in the cover of darkness and foggy days, so asto keep the enemy in ignorance of the movements. For three weeks the work was carried on determinedly and when it was completed and the many platforms put up at a last sixty thousand two hundred pounder parrot and Krupp and a centimeter guns were mounted up it for an extent of six miles sixteen miles. One of the batteries was called "Battery Damnation" and sent shells into Dorothy Gale fifteen miles away.

On January the seventeenth the fierce bombardment began by an attack by the immense line of batteries and fleet upon Port Gertrude Hoffmann. For fourteen days and nights it was kept up steadily, and so terrific was the fire of so many guns directed against it that despite the covering fire from the other Christian fortifications its walls began to crumble. In the meantime General

Henry Schoeman Ambrose and troops pressed again on for Fortess Sicilliano Sicilliano, gradually under heavy fire moving their big lines nearer and nearer, and even digging their way and blowing their way forward in spite of the tempest of shot and shell into the fort. Many big explosions occurred. When at last on Feb 6th they were near enough to get within the ramparts by a single bound, and they were preparing for a sudden sudden overwhelming assault, the Angolians left it and fled to Fortess Folly opposite Gertrude Hoffmann. The Angolians were soon also driven from there, and so these two fortresses were now in the possession of the Insurgents. The immense number of big guns of these two big forts were now directed against Port Gertrude Hoffmann and it soon became silent. But when on the night of the eighth an armed force went from a long string of transports and battleships in small boats to take possession, the garrison suddenly arose from its silence and drove the glandolinian assailants back with dreadful loss. A little later about six days, General Schoeman Ambrose concentrated all his heaviest guns upon it and reduced it to a heap of ruins. Although the glandolinians did not at once attempt the capture of Porothy Gale, its importance for a time as a commercial mart for the Christians was destroyed.

The fierce fighting around Mumbi earlier in the siege also had taken great effect upon that town. All blinds in the windows were closed, and here and there the people would hurry along fearing shells, flowers drooped and whirled on the lonely window sills because there were no tender hands to attend to them. The sidewalks glistened with fragments of glass, rattled and thither by the concussion of so many exploding shells, here of a house a cornice was knocked off, or many houses were seen in a line burned out like a shell, there you could see small holes in the walls of buildings, beyond a number of big houses in ruins as if a tornado struck them, and at remote intervals the earth and streets were torn up where shells exploded and looked like the work of giants in search of hidden treasures.

During the time when the rebels had early in the siege gained possession of the town of Kittens, the herds and having re-occupied Mumbi and other important posts, the fierce Gargoylian hordes at last carried on their fierce guerrilla warfare all around the rear of the Christian army. Early in the month of December General Jimmie Gannon fell upon the north end of the Christian position two miles north of captured Kittens. He was repulsed but being repulsed with a loss of over two hundred thousand men, went back to Kittens. He then at Kittens Riecherts he got together a part of Manley's of Adelaide-De-Garbes Main force numbering about eight million men and moved against the that section of the Christian line again for the purpose of seizing the main Angolinian stores at Bank Crossroads near the town of Chamberline. In attempted raid however was completely checked by General Henry Joseph Dodge who attacked him fiercely at the crossroads on December 5th and drove him back to Kittens Riecherts. Other similar bands of fierce Gargoylians rained over the region trying various means to break the Christian lines by making thousands of daring raids. On December the seventeenth there was a sharp cavalry battle at Brush Creek, between a large force of glandolinian Gargoylians led by General Jim Perkins and the Angolinian concentration cavalry under General James Frank Gannon. The glandolinian troopers were defeated and a part of the rebel cavalry force fled into Kittens Riecherts. In deed many thousands of Gargoylian bands made much trouble in the rear of the Christian armies at Porothy Gale, Ozma and Angolinia at Agathia and elsewhere. One of the fierce Gargoylian troops led by a brutal general called Killchild and another general by the name of John Love, under committed a horrible atrocity at St Anne's village near Kittens Riecherts.

With a band of about three hundred and fifty thousand Scodler Scodler Gargoylians and glandolinians all mounted on the swiftest horses loaned from the wheelbarrow, these two wicked rebel commanders dashed into the small defenseless town on December the fifteenth 1914 and began a scene of pillage and violence equalled only by the worse scenes witnessed in other great glandolinian massacres at Melanionburg, Galantrina, and Jennie Richee and Jennie Vian. Many houses were set on fire, and the citizens and the soldiers who could not escape were cruelly murdered. Women and children again especially suffered, they being shot on sight or disembowled. The grown people were taken prisoners and hurried toward the rebel lines on the pretense of being interned there but were led to the river, bound hand and foot and cast into the water to drown. One Angolinian officer who was captured and whose headquarters was burned wastold if he would give the fiends information as to the strength of the Christian armies defending Angolinia Agathia he would not be killed, but he refused to do so and he was therefore shot and killed. In another place two children both girls were found protected by their big brother they having thrown their arms around him and begging for their lives and though the glandolinian ruffians did in one way heed the petition, one of the ruffians however deliberately pushed his revolver between the two pretty little girls and fired a fatal shot which killed the boy and rendered the girls without a brother. The massacre was indeed terrible. Two thousand one hundred and seventy five unarmed men were killed, and two thousand more wounded, while six hundred children were disembowled and hung up in that condition, and thousands of houses laid in ashes before the fiends left and made their escape before the Christian army came up to repel it. It is probable many have read of the so called outrages committed in the so called dark ages, and horrible as they may have appeared to them, they did indeed sink into very small insignificance in comparison with what the survivors of that little village of St Anne was compelled to witness.

Hundreds of well known citizens women and priests and nuns and lay brothers were lying completely roasted or mangled in front of the spot where their stores, residences and homes had been. The bodies were a little crisp and black and many of the survivors at first thought they were all negroes till they were recognized.

Even the Angolinian soldiers who had to set to work to bury the slain in handling the dead bodies were horrified to find pieces of roasted flesh remaining in their hands. For many of the Angolinians their strength failed them in this horrible and sickening work. To make the scene worse women and little children who survived were roaming all over the town hunting for their husbands, fathers or brothers and sisters, and sad indeed was the scene when they did finally find them among the many corpses laid out for recognition. I dare not even describe the horrors, for language fails me now, and the recollections of the scenes the survivors had to witness many many sick or go insane from sorrow over loss of homes and dear ones.

General Love's murder soon afterwards December the twentieth attacked General Randall's force near Paraphrase (Dis) Lorelei, while the latter was on his way with an escort of one hundred thousand cavalry from Norman town to Port Moll which he had taken possession of and garrisoned the previous week. In the bloody conflict that ensued nearly all of General Randall's force were killed and those who were only wounded at first were set upon and murdered. General Randall managed to escape with about a dozen of his men to Little Fort Schoelder.

A few weeks before this General Jacksonia Thompson with eight million glandolinians made a fierce attempt to capture the strongly fortified post of Little Verona on the Erminia then in command in of General Pare-not Lie. General Thompson fiercely attacked the Christian positions on December the first but after a sharp struggle was repulsed. When as the glandolinians abandoned that section of the main line of works General Pare-not Lie on December the tenth started out with twelve million five hundred thousand men and four thousand pieces of artillery to attempt the capture of Little Verona Junction. He reached the vicinity of that town early on the second week or third week of December, and arranging their main forces in six columns they moved up on each side of the strait stream.

The Glandelinians fled at their approach to Phintor on the Ouch River. Kenneth Josie who was now at New D. Turner determined at the beginning of January to recover Gittons, Locherts and the "Ifknools". He sent general William Geholdecker with four million troops to seize the Glandelinian post at Langorelala Pass on the boundary line between the states of Ozma and Angelina Vine. At the same time fourteen hundred gunboats, commanded by Admiral Jameson were detached from the main Glandelinian squadrons or Angelinian squadrons and sent to cooperate with general Josie, but owing to the strength of the Glandelinian batteries and a premature attack by the gunboats and ships, twenty of the latter were disabled and captured with all on board, so that the bloody Christian expedition was a failure. General Josie then concentrated his main land forces on the Kato hme on creek in the hope of being able to cut through a portion of the rebel line under general Texas from the east by way of Chamberlans but he soon afterwards concluded instead of trying to obtain possession of the river harbor, sending a large force of troops and cavalry under general Braynia Johnson across the stream as a flint, general Josie dispatched general Jakob Marcus with six million more troops and many war vessels up the Erminie Grand Run. These soldiers managed to land and after a hard fight drove the Glandelinians up that river defeating the rebel cavalry also and then pressed on to St Vincent's village, opposite Glandelinia, where they encamped January the sixth. Then that month therefore closed the Angelinians were in possession of all the strong positions once in possession of the enemy in that location, excepting Gombi and other towns near by, and the forts near there.

This section of the year opened very encouragingly for the Angelinian cause. Indeed there were many immense signs pointing to the early downfall of the Glandelinian besiegers of Angelina Agathia and Porothy Gale..... even in Angelina State itself more than eighty thousand miles of territory and square miles had been recovered by the Angelinians. A good part of Calverinia was freed of the rebels, and there were now in the west about eight hundred million Christian troops in the field against only half that number of Glandelinian confederates.

The people in Glandelinia and in all their southern states were no longer willing to volunteer for the military service of Glandelinia and the authorities of all the rebel states were getting desperate. They had recently passed laws declaring every man liable to bear arms whether he had little defects or not to be in the military service to repel the Christian armies, and that upon his failure to report at a military station within a certain time he was liable to face the penalty of death as a deserter. Another cause of main satisfaction to the defenders of Angelina Agathia at this time was the action of many of the rulers and prime ministers of the Christian nations of the world, in decidedly ignoring the existence of the main Confederate States and countries and the Provinces of Glandelinia and Calverinia, by issuing a notice to the effect that no vessels were to be fitted out in any country even aiding for Glandelinia for deprecating on the commerce of Angelina and her states be by private persons employed by the "So called Glandelinian confederate states".....

The Angelinian national authorities determined to push the resistance to the siege of Angelina Agathia with greater vigor than ever during the approach of the New Year. For this reason general Hanson Vivian finally selected at his brother's advice his most vigorous military commander, general Conventinian Aronburg, and creating anew for him the office of a captain or lieutenant general, placed him in full command of the besieging armies or armies mean that was resisting the armies of besieging Glandelinians. So with a determination to crush the Glandelinian besiegers as soon as possible, general Hanson Robert Vivian and Conventinian Aronburg and their generals held a great convention and at once planned a sharp and decisive movement. It was arranged for the recapture of Mombi and the other towns by the army of Angelina under all the various generals, and for the recapture of the railroad lines near by, by general Jimmie Vivian and his forces.

IN February 1894. The general Jimmie Vivian at the head of twenty million troops started on one of the most destructive Christian raids of the war, from Glandelinia to the intersection of Ozma and Angelina Agathia to the other intersection of the intersection of important railroads in possession of the enemy at Rosa and Topsy, railroad line to an enormous enormous distance westward up and also everything in the right of way places of rebel public property or property in the hands of the rebels was destroyed, even the ties of the railroad tracks which had been ripped up and the ties set on fire and all the stations and long lines of car cars set on the line of march and movements burned.

General Jimmie Vivian's purpose of the raid was to push on toward Mombi, and then if circumstances favored it, to go southward still further and make a momentary gain the enemy rear. But at Child Grove Huntrell the main reinforcements he expected in the shape of general Joe Jennings with an enormous force of cavalry did not materialize and therefore he was compelled to give up his very plan. After waiting for a week for the approach of general Joe Jennings army of cavalry he set fire to Child Grove Huntrell and started again for his own lines at Porothy Gale with four hundred thousand prisoners and fifty five thousand liberated child slaves and Christian soldiers also. Inspired by this tremendous raid general Double Day Federal Johnston in command of a part of general Adele-De-Garles army in the northern section of the siege of Angelina Agathia had sent reinforcements to general Be Beppe Evans, then still in charge of the Angelinian Confederate army in that region but soon afterwards was compelled to recall them to help in defending his own army against a Christian force under general Cabian Jodges, which had been sent down from Betsey Gobbin. These two forces met between Betsey Gobbin and Trot in February and it resulted in the Christians under general Jodges being severely defeated and his army and himself himself forced to surrender. Simultaneously to the time of the raid being made by Jimmie Vivian's army general Joseph H. Greatheart of the rebel side with an enormous army of terrible (Hooded Terror) Wheeler Gargoylans made an attack upon the fortified works of the Christians between Rosa and Topsy.

Killed the fortified works being situated upon high works and bluffs and hills on the banks of the river Erminie Orr Creek above Ozma town. The works were defended by fifty five hundred and fifty seven thousand Angelinian Glandelinians, two hundred and sixty three thousand of which were Conventinian troops. The works also swarmed with brave child scouts who warned the troops of the enemy's approach. The attack began on the morning of February the fourteenth.

It was attacked with the most wicked intention of by the rebels, and was vigorously pressed up to three and four o'clock that bloody day without any evident success, although the Glandelinians managed to kill the Angelinian generals who commanded the works, and whose places were at once taken by general Aronburg, Jens Jensen and Frank Stanck. The gunboat and other ship fleet did good service in the defense of the works by throwing volleys of big shells and gave with dreadful and marked effect into the Glandelinian columns. General Greatheart soon felt he could not carry the works by an abrupt assault, so instead of sitting down to a regular siege of it and the Christian force, he sent under a flag of truce a sudden demand for the surrender of the works and positions, and at the same time took advantage of the stopping of the battle to move his immense force of men up to a position where they could with almost a single bound gain the inside of the works.

General Aronburg Jensen being a reply of refusal to surrender, general Greatheart's men made a sudden and sudden rush in great fury, and with the cry "No quarter to Christian dogs." who oppose us rebels" sprang over the ramparts and attacked the Angelinians like a herd of demons. The scene then enacted was so cruel and horrible that I could find no words to describe it here as it was, and immediately after the affair the Joint Committees on the Conduct and Expenditures of War of both sides was appointed to investigate the affair.

After the capture of the works and when the Angelinian forces fought desperately to the last man the rebels having annihilated the Christian force buried into the towns of Rosa and Topsy and there followed a scene of utmost cruelty and murder which needed but the butchers on their thrones to proceed through the bodies executed by the Glandelinians.

After they had rushed into the two towns the glandelinians executed on all sides a senseless one of the most indiscriminate slaughters ever known in the annals of a civilized warfare, sparing neither age or sex, white or black, soldier nor civilian. The glandelinian officers and men lived with each other in the devilish work, men women and even children, nuns and priests and all manifestations of religious persons were overboard, were deliberately shot down, beaten blacked with swords, or even tortured beyond any description and many of the children not more than eight or nine years old even ten or eleven were forced to stand up between two or three men and face the ferocious armed murderers while being disemboweled alive or while being shot, the sick and wounded taken out of hospitals to the number of scores of thousands, were butchered without mercy without mercy, the rebels even entered a series of Great Catholic Hospitals and dragging out the patients shot them either outside or as they lay in their beds unable to offer even the least resistance. Children girls or boys found in the hospital wards were wounded by gunshot or knife during the time towns were plundered by both sides, were also disemboweled while helpless in a d d n e cruelty which the most fiendish malignity could devise was committed by these murderers. One little girl who was wounded in the leg while trying to escape the Gargoylians when captured and despite being in a condition so that she could not walk or stand on the leg, was nevertheless made to stand up while one of her tormentors strangled her to death, others children or men and women who were wounded and unable to stand were held up and shot. One man who was a soldier was deliberately fastened down on a rudely made cross and then the cross was fastened to the wall inside his wooden house by means of big nails driven through the cross and his hands and feet and into the wall behind him so that he could not possibly escape and at last he was crowned with a long roll of wood made to imitate the crucifix of Our Lord the building was set on fire and he was burned, another who was a boy was nailed on a cross to a the side of a building in a pose and then the building set on fire and burned down. These scores of thousands of different deeds of cruelty and murder which would like six big books to describe ceased when night came on, only to be renewed the following morning, when the fierce human demons carefully sought among the dead lying all about in all directions for any of the wounded men women children or nuns and priests yet alive, and those they found were deliberately tortured until they died. Innumerable sacrilegious were also committed, and crosses and crucifixes were insulted and spit upon, and then burned. Religious pictures taken out of ruined convents were paraded through the streets in mockery, and the Sacred Hosts of Our Lord taken out of churches were also paraded through streets, and given to horses and swine to eat. The whole scene was full of a million other instances of barbarity and wicked insults but those described will suffice to show to some extent the horrible cruelty of general Greatheart and his Wheeler Gargoylians. As to the fate of the captured commanders of the christian works when they were captured, the evidence given to the committee of both sides showed that they were made prisoners, and while being taken to the main rebel lines beyond Mombi was led out into an open space by some of Great Hearts Gargoylians and torn to death.

The christian forces of immense size was moving against him general Greatheart at once began his retreat, and large numbers of troops were sent out against him from porothy Gale by general Hanson Vivian to intercept the rebel murderer. His force came up with him at Nellie town on the last day of february on the Mic-Hollester and Panro Pandora railroad lines but after a severe battle of two days duration, the Angelinians were driven back with great loss. Then general Jack Evans set out with twelve million men to hunt the rebel butcher up and capture or drive him away. They found him and his force near Turnerama two days after the defeat of the other christian force and in a conflict general Jack Evans was wounded and his army soon scattered in panic. Then soon afterwards general Beppo Evans of the christian side was sent toward Rosa to make the same attempt with 10,000,000 men when general Greatheart, flanked his army, captured half of it, drove the rest into disorder, pursued and scattered it, and then dashed into Mombi, and escaped safely to the main rebel line after striking striking three christian forces crushing blows despite his wicked massacre and sacrilegious he had committed. Faked as he was and terrible in nature it must be said that never in the war did general Greatheart of the rebels ever lose a battle.

General Hans Hanson Vivian at the same time that this great massacre had occurred had organized another great expedition of troops to attempt the recovery of Mombi. His was to be done by movement of general Robert Vivians army by way of the Winkie River and Emerald City or Emerald Port. The expedition was also to have the aid and co-operation of Admiral Francis Hollester with a fleet of river warships such as gunboats, merrimacs and monitors on the Erminie Creek Creek, general Vivianama at Dorothy Gale, and a detachment from general Germanine Vivians army. Germanine Vivians troops led by general A.J. Turner went up the Erminie Creek in a long line of transports, followed by Admiral Mic-Hollesters fleet of warships. They managed to capture fort Tip and Woodman Turner and on february sixteenth took possession of Glinda and Scarecrow town where he was joined on the twenty seventh by general Handons column led by general Ben Logan which had moved from flathead junction by way of Poppy Dorothy gun field. General Robert Vivian now began to take his whole force up the river to Evansville where he met the christian fleet under Mic-Hollester. Then he pushed on toward the direction of Mombi, a directing his advance for Emerald Port, while the lighter ships and dreadnaughts and other gunboats went up the river with a large body of noncommissioned troops under general Allenburger Killyby. The glandelinians were driven as far as Constantine or Constantine or Angeline Turner Crossroads where they made a desperate and most vehement stand March the eighth 1914 under generals Jimmie Gannon, Jesipine Jensen, and Thomson James O'Connor. The advance force of general Vivians army tried to drive the rebels from both these places in the desperate struggle, but the whole army of glandelinians stood their ground so well and fought so bravely and desperately, that even when the largest part of general Robert Vivians troops came up and aided in the attack against them with overwhelming numbers, they soon defeated the Angelinians with great loss, captured three hundred battle flags, a hundred thousand prisoners ten generals, and drove the remainder of the army back in total rout and confusion with a million dead strewn the path of retreat. It had been and was a horrible disaster and their disastrous retreat had been covered for a while by ten divisions under general Hanson Meldon Aronburg at Childrens Grove, two miles from the main battlefield. General Aronburg after a desperate battle also fell back with the main army of christian troops who continued their retreat fifteen miles further; but being pursued and hard pressed, another battle was fought March the ninth and tenth at Childrens Hill. It was more severe than Childrens Grove and again resulted as a victory for the glandelinians under general Cannon who wished to renew the attack and drive the main christian army before him but on advice of his generals he did not do so and the Angelinian forces were allowed to fall back to Grand Childrens Orphan Home on the Winkie River, where the christian fleet were anchored. So that place the christian troops also under general Germanine Vivian defeated in a battle at St Gertrudes Orphan Asylum returned, after some sharp and continual fighting all the way up the river with pursuing Angelinian rebels under general Joseph Logan. As food and water could only be procured with great difficulty in that region it was now determined to continue the retreat to Dorothy Gale. As a portion of the river from levees being burst by the rebels was falling rapidly the fleet had difficulty in passing the bars at Grand Orphan Asylum in Lane Run but succeeded in doing so March the seventeenth. Then the defeated christian army started off on the twenty second and reached Dorothy Gale again on the twenty seventh. The expedition or drive against Mombi and Emerald city was abandoned and the naval and land forces prepared to return to the Angeline gun river. The water in the rapids of the Angeline Run river near Dorothy Gale and Ozma had on account of the enemy also blowing up levees here had become so shallow from the water going out upon distant land that to get the fleet past them the river above had to be dammed, and the ships and other craft floated down over the rocks and on the bottom of the flood that was suddenly set free through the sluices. This was done with great skill and industry under the direction of many engineer officers and general Houghton Jensen of whole brigade of engineers and army constructors. Upon its accomplishment the whole expedition pushed toward the Angeline gun.

General Beppo Evans however soon lost much of the ground he had gained. The Angelinians being reinforced rallied and falling fiercely upon his exhausted troops forced them steadily back to their original position with dreadful loss. When general Noro Vivania arrived on the scene from a forced march of twenty miles from Dorothy Gale and general Concentinian Aronburg then decided to make a most strong effort to turn the main Landelinian left wing. In four long lines the Angelinians advanced and poured on over the open field which from the enemy's shell fire of grape and shell looked like the Valley of Ten Thousand smokes in a moment. The four immense Christian lines of attack was in a short time shattered to fragments by their losses but nevertheless the survivors rushed up with dreadful fury and threw themselves so desperately upon the positions of generals Beppo Evans and Isner Myletze that by the force of the onslaught they broke through like a tidal wave would through a forest of trees and for a few hours it seemed as if they surely would win the day. But general Joseph Henry Dargers' immense gimmermannian division immediately rushed up to the immense break and managed by the hardest fighting of the siege to keep the Christian assailants in check but could not drive them back, and he got severely wounded in the leg by a tree falling on him when it was cut down by a sudden shower of canister and grape. General Concentinian Aronburg being determined at all costs to effectually turn the main Landelinian left wing, and Adele-De-Garbe being just as desperate and just as determined not to let him do so, these two armies battle with the most extreme and terrible ferocity for nearly four hours, and in the sixteen hand-to-hand conflicts that ensued during close quarters charges both sides fought savagely face to face like armies of murderous cannibals. The slaughter on both sides was horrible in the extreme, and all through the whole region of Children Knol for the whole length of forty miles the death struggle went on until a darkness soon put a stop to it. That night the fields for so many miles presented a most dreary desolate sight. The dead and wounded lay everywhere like fallen or cut grain and wheat along every one of the low ridges and slopes and in front of the hastily thrown up works and intrenchments, and hundreds of fires were burning and the wooded territory looked as if a cyclone of terrible violence had torn its way through with dreadful effects. General Adele-De-Garbe spent the horrible night in getting what survived of his army of troops into a new and more stronger position so as to be ready for his Christian enemy if the big battle should be renewed in the morning.

But the Angelinian forces did not make another attack the next day, and general Adele-De-Garbe decided the Christian forces were preparing to make a retreat toward Ozma or Dorothy Gale. In order therefore to intercept them and cut off general Concentinian Aronburg's communications with the three cities of Ozma, Angelinia Agathia and the Christian armies near Dorothy Gale, and the two Vivianians, general Adele-De-Garbe ordered a most rapid night movement or forward march toward a bend of the same junction of Childrens Knol called Chesterlollie. The main advance started out therefore at eight o'clock that very night. Hearing of this movement through Gertrude Angeline his niece and also the Vivianians and some of their own scouts general Concentinian Aronburg dispatched general Francis Viviananna and Wienstien to the same place and that night a peculiar race between the two opposing forces occurred almost in the same fashion as the race between Lee and Grant for Gettysburg.

General Viviananna knew his country well, knew all the maps well and so took the most direct of the routes, and therefore reached Chesterlollie first.

Upon the arrival of Isner Myletze's troops or corps divisions which was in the main Landelinian advance, general Bob Winderlines six brigades of general Picknell's main division was ordered to charge upon the place there, as it was known that general Viviananna and his Abbieannian force had already reached there.

The result indeed was the almost complete destruction of that whole Landelinian force and the death of their leader and all commanders down to sergeants, the remaining brigade being reduced only to a regiment, and the same regiment finally on its retreat losing three fourths more of its number. The few surviving troops were falling back in the wildest of disorder, when general Isner Myletze came up all but seventeen thousand of his four hundred thousand men were killed wounded or taken prisoners. The gallant Landelinian general was a son of general Walter Jennings who fought on the Christian side if you please to ask.

The army of Landelinia around Vivian Angelinia Agathia began finally a movement from the north on March the last. It was arranged in three immense divisions or main corps, command commanded by four hundred generals, the second main corps commanded by general Bell Bellen, the fifth by general Philishor Shradar, and the sixth by Bededier Snieder. The army in many numerous columns safely crossed the streams of the Winkie North River, Grinnie Creek, and Evangeline St. Clare river and then started on a movement through a thickly wooded region general Conillion Godfrey commanding the immense Landelinian cavalry forces and leading the advance and also protecting the immense train of more than four million wagons. The region through which this vast Landelinian army was pushing on extended from Dorothy Gale to Erminie Gun River a distance of seventy miles in which a portion of general Concentinian Aronburg's main army was intrenched. General Concentinian Aronburg decided to attack this vast Landelinian army while it was moving forward through this beautiful region and where he had concentrated his own divisions toward a point or place called Carranzantin Children Knol. Before this tremendous battle opened general Bededier Snieder had reached the Children Knol tavern, ten miles south of where he had ordered the Saxton gun, and general Shradar was on his extreme right, with his immense line extending down to the river. General Adele-De-Garbe who had intended to move against the Vivians, and finding out that Concentinian Aronburg was concentrated against him and that a battle was to be forced upon him in this unfavorable spot, directed general Bell Bellen who had crossed sixteen miles down the river the day before to hasten forward to general Snieder's support and form the left wing of defense.

General Concentinian Aronburg at once attempted to get between general Snieder and Bellen and thus divide the main Landelinian army with the purpose to throw in a big flanking army and strike Adele-De-Garbe in the rear. But general Adele-De-Garbe prevented this by sending Beppo Evans divisions, the advance of his main corps which just then came up, and the divisions of general Berand federal to hold the Angelinians back until the main balance of Beppo Evans army would arrive. This was successfully done after a storming battle of four hours, and the Angeinians were driven back, and the rebel line closed entirely on the left when the struggle resumed with redoubled fury. It was a very strange and yet hard fought conflict, very violent and dangerous to both sides. On a line of forty miles nearly two hundred million men were engaged, while the long lines of scores of thousands of artillery and other cannons made so much smoke, which added by artillery and musketry and bombs bursting that not a thousand men at times could see each other more than fifty yards away. The ground thickly covered at places with pines, cedars, shrub oaks, and tangled underbrush and vines as also used as defensive points until set on fire by the terrible discharge of artillery and musketry. The contest raged with the greatest fury all day long general Isner Myletze coming up with his Scodler Landelinians attacking the Angelinians under generals Jenstien and Viviananna on the left, while general Beppo Evans fell upon the main Christian line nearest to him. When all along the main Angelinian federal line extending for seventeen miles at this section the battle raged furiously and with extreme violence. General Isner Myletze and Beppo Evans attack was a most furious one indeed, and they steadily drove the Christian line of seventeen miles back for long for nearly two miles after making a gradually tidal wave movement all along the line. The crash of so many cannons on both sides and the awful noise of musketry was deafening for fifty miles, and scores of millions of trees in the whole neighborhood for many miles westward and hocked beyond recognizing by the terrific storm of bullets, grape and canister and almost stripped of bark and leaves by the frequent frequent explosions of shot shell and grape. In this struggle general Gidding under was especially distinguishing himself before his Landelinian officers and men by leading the main charge when he was at struck in the head by a fragment of grape and instantly killed.

Dashing swiftly forward on his horse this handsome glandelinian general seized a second National for gladiatorial and gallantly rallied the few hundred men and with them he held the immense force of Abbeismannian in check for a few minutes time by firing from behind trees and rocks until the other portions of his immense force arrived. Then with the assistance of the divisions of McKnoll and Crawford Baldwin and Beldeldier Snileyder a most desperate attack was made in revenge upon the whole christian position, and after six charges amid the most heavy losses the works were finally carried and the Abbeismannians driven back in confusion. Toward noon the glandelinians therefore had advanced to within three miles or more of Chesterfollis. At the time of the dreadful fray general Kindernine gormose of the christian side while directing some batteries was shot through the head by a canister ball and one of the best of the christian generals fell dead. The rest of the day nothing much but sharp skirmishing and artillery duels was done by either side that day, while therefore the armies were preparing for another desperate battle the glandelinian general Greatheart took his murderous Gargoylian cavalry on a desperate raid to sever general Concentinian Aronburg's communications with the main armies and the three cities. He did manage to get in the rear of the Angelinian forces, and at once moved on once more spreading horror and destruction in his path, tearing up lines of more railroads, and committing some horrible massacres, until he reached the first line of works around porothy Gale. Therefore not being able at all to get any further, he then returned. The next day after pouring a fearful storm of shot and shell in a perfect thirty mile long barrage into the extensive christian position and relieving the same in return for a long while, from four o'clock in the morning to about four o'clock in the afternoon general Adele-De-Garbe ordered a grand and most general assault with cheers and shouts the immense columns advanced through a storming fire that fairly swept their main lines and shattering them at every step. It was a most gallant charge although completely useless. The fire along the Abbeismannian line was so murderous and destructive that it was soon found the christian works and positions could not be taken, and when night finally fell the glandelinians indeed suffered a most fearful loss in men and generals, without having gained anything whatever.

Having taken advantage of the darkness and changed his position in the night general Beppo Evans on that next morning the twelfth of April was now on the left flank of the christian army under Concentinian Aronburg. About six o'clock in the morning his immense force of troops suddenly burst upon an immense angle of christian works held by general Tenstien and after a fearful conflict of dreadful ferocity swept over the ramparts, and captured nearly all of the divisions division the general narrowing escape being taken himself. General Beppo Evans then drove the rest of the christian force before him nearly two miles after still harding fighting, where the Angelinians finally rallied and charged back upon him, and a more terrible fight ensued. Other immense corps were brought up to the slaughter on both sides, and the most desperate struggle of the battle continued for hours and hours. Gravely and most desperately desperately the glandelinians strove to follow up the great advantage they had thus gained, and gallantly the Angelinians resisted them, and even attempted most furiously to recover every inch of lost ground and were repulsed. It was indeed a most useless waste of life on both sides. The positions of both sides were not changed at midnight, when general Concentinian Aronburg withdrew behind a second and stronger line of intrenchments. Since crossing the streams and fighting these two battles the army of Adele-De-Garbe, lost nearly forty million men killed and wounded, while the christian army under Concentinian Aronburg lost about thirty million men.

Just before the two terrible battles of Cra Carranzantia Children Knoll occurred general Adele-De-Garbe ordered general Manley Manlet to move his army from the extreme right up toward Childreans Mine hundred, a small stretch of forest on the river, to co-operate with the christian glandelinian army to force Concentinian Aronburg back. General Manley Manlet started March the fourth, with twenty five million men, up the main Angeline Run river, his force marching up both banks on land and the rest in a long line of armed transports and warships.

He landed at Ormer and Betay poblin point near Trot at the mouth of the Mainie creek fifteen miles below the Angelinian Capitol, and planted his immense army on the narrow strip of beautiful glens and woodlands known as Childreans Mine hundred. A long line of intrenchments was at once set up across this beautiful peninsula from Trot town to the Mainie Creek.

While this was being done a portion of general Robert Vivian's army under general Walter J. Jennings went up from Betay poblin with three million cavalry men to attempt the destruction of the railroads south and west of porothy Gale to prevent supplies reaching the enemy but he found that portion strongly defended and the city also by a stretch of the right wing of general Adele-De-Garbe's army under general Bernard Gnydie, who had been summoned from Mombi to Betay poblin.

The latter being greatly reinforced now joined some of his troops in front of general Manley Manlet's forces on Childreans Mine hundred and when general Vivian's main force arrived he took personal command, and on March the Seventeen 17th he attempted to turn general Manlet's right and left flanks. A terrible battle here was the result and raged for two days, and general Manley's forces being overwhelmed were driven to their own intrenchments with the loss of 10,000,000 in killed wounded and prisoners, while that of the christians was 15,444,678/3 in killed and wounded only. A few days afterwards general Manley Manlet was requested to send a large part of his main troops to the main north side of the Mainie river to assist the army of Adele-De-Garbe in the vicinity of Chesterfollis and Childreans Knoll. The compliance with this order deprived general Manlet of the power to make further offensive movements.

At the same time general Gormaine Vivian went on a raid again toward Childreans Mine hundred March the thirteenth. Passing very near Betay poblin on Mainie Heights he swept around by Chesterfollis Courthouse and struck the Abbeismannian, Bondinia and Calverine railroad eleven miles west of the Angelinian Capitol. When striking it at other points he went eastward making attempts to destroy the southside railroad, and the Meldon crossroads, far toward porothy Gale, and then returned to his own lines with one hundred and forty two thousand prisoners. General Adele-De-Garbe now decided to make a fierce effort to move on porothy Gale again. His army started March the twenty first and reaching the passage of the Winkie river found that general Concentinian Aronburg had already moved in that direction and had therefore planted his army there first. After another most severe battle Concentinian Aronburg's right wing was dislodged, and Adele-De-Garbe pressed steadily forward, and by March the twenty eighth was south of the Winkie river. General Concentinian Aronburg however had swung his army around in another direction and therefore had followed, and taking a more shorter route was now in front, occupying a most strong position on the Angeline Run river again, which commanded one of the Angelinian Agathia turnpikes, and two remaining railroads leading to porothy Gale and Angelinia Agathia.

Therefore general Adele-De-Garbe saw at once that it would be necessary to drive Concentinian Aronburg from his strong position before he could continue his own onward movement toward porothy Gale. After a most dangerous reconnaissance general Garbe decided it best to attempt a big flanking movement and cross the Angeline Run at Mine Bando-Bockinia. That little place an outlying post near another abandoned orphan asylum was seized and the army reinforced by the main troops under general Beppo Evans sent by general Beppo Evans and Izner Myletze from the center. For four days May, first, second, third, and fourth the two armies fiercely struggled on the ground where general Robert Vivian and Adele-De-Garbe had fought for the possession of Mombi some months before. The battle on the fourth day was terribly sanguinary: millions of men falling in the brief space of forty minutes on both sides. At its concluding the glandelinians naturally held their ground, but they failed in their attempt to force general Concentinian Aronburg from his positions. And the strength of general Concentinian Aronburg's positions showed general Adele-De-Garbe that porothy Gale could not be taken in that direction. So after sending general Izner Myletze with his immense force of cavalry to Gandamon to destroy more railroads between Angelinia Agathia and the Mainie Creek valley and Evangeline place, general Adele-De-Garbe decided to transfer his big army to the south side of the Angeline Run river, and attempt the capture of porothy Gale in that way.

On the night of May the twelfth the army of Glandelinians therefore silently withdrew and continued to withdraw for several nights, remaining motionless in the day to deceive generalinian Arouburg, and finally crossing the three streams by fording and pontoons was well on its way southward before generalinian Arouburg knew of its movements. It moved below the region of Kittens Locherts and toward Jennie Turner, and on toward Mob Mombi to the Erminie, where it crossed in boats by fording and pontoons. General Adele-De-Garbo hurried on toward Childrens line hundred while the crossing was being made and ordered general Manlet to send a portion of his troops to attempt the capture of Ozma before generalinian Arouburg could reinforce general Robert Ivian. At this was unsuccessful and on the evening of May the 16th the army of Glandelinia took up a strong position near to where general Ivian had cast his camp near the city. At this very time a most formidable raid was made by the Glandelinians under general Bicknell Barney with about fifteen million Glandelinian troops for the purpose of drawing if possible a large force away from generalinian Ivians army. He hurried down the rear of the Erminie Valley region and crossing the Win Winkie river at Glinda moved toward the town of Marygown. Near this place he was suddenly confronted by a few Angelinian troops, which general Adel then in command of the Home Guards had hastily collected at Baltimore and a portion of general Paul Marcus division division from the advance of the main corps, which general Hanson had dispatched to the protection of Angelinia Agathia in that location. For eight hours on the first day of May this little band of Angelinian soldiers battled with general Bicknells much larger force of Glandelinians, and although it was defeated with most heavy loss, its gallant stand saved the rear guard works of the Angelinian Nat ion National Capitol, and allowed time for the main christian army in that section under another Ivianama to reach the works and secure it just in time. General Bicknell learning of this on his way to Dorothy Gale from the rear, rapidly crossed the Erminie with his immense store of spoils. General Jennie Ivian who took his own place again on the slight recovery from his wounds pursued him for two miles through a section of Angelina Baldon run when after a battle in which the invaders were driven back to their own positions, general Jennie Ivian returned to his own lines. General Bicknell Tamplin remained in his own position for some time.

After a very sharp contest of two days duration with general germaine ric hardsons christian troops Barecrow junction on May the twentieth in which Bicknell Tamplines troops were severely defeated, and another battle with general Remo pomington Turner in which the latter was forced back to the Erminie general Bicknell Tampline early in June sent a cavalry force of three million men under generals Berns, Bridge and Bernard Russell on another plundering tour toward the town of Marygown. They reached the small town and burned it down and slaughtered all the poor people and soldiers and women and children in it. General Jennie Ivian who was ten miles away, heard of this immediately, and at once moved against the Gargoylian raiders, driving them back to their own positions.

And to prevent a repetition of this raid general Robert Ivian sent the divisions under his two sons into the region and they immediately took measures to drive Bicknell Tampline from his own positions. The two Ivians there fore attacked and defeated him at Gertrude Angelina, on the tenth of June and followed him to a strong position on Grass Grassfern hills near Betsy pobbin from which the Glandelinians were driven with great loss on the twenty second and chased to the grounds of District Orphan Asylum. From there the Angelinian cavalry followed Bicknell Tampline to Launtonie Orphan Asylum two miles away, and compelled him to take refuge in the range of Betsy pobbin hills. The Angelinians then fell back to Herdrudes Junctions and general Robert Ivians went to general Hanson Ivians lines to find him at his headquarters to hold a council having the belief that the region would not be troubled against again by Bicknells Glandelinians. But general Bicknell being reinforced on June six days later and attacked the armies under general Jennie and Germaine Ivian at Erminie Creek so stubbornly and so fiercely that they were compelled to fall back to the two orphan asylums and their grounds previously mentioned. General Robert Ivian was still at general Hansons headquarters when the desperate Glandelinian attack began and hearing the sound of many guns and the roar of many big explosions, sprang upon his horse and dashed toward Erminie Creek almost in the same manner that Herdrude did at the battle of Cedar Creek. He met large portions of the armies under his two sons in full retreat as he galloped up. He saw that to save them from disaster he must put his own army into action and so he did. The fearful battle raged all day but toward evening the tide was turned, and following their brave commanders the Angelinians charged to victory and drove the Glandelinians in total rout to where they had emerged from almost annihilating general Bicknell Tamplines army. Then the army of Adele-De-Garbo lay near as possible to Dorothy Gale generalinian Arouburg withdrew a large force of his army from that city to defend Angelinia Agathia from the troops sent by general Beppo Evans and Izner Myletze over pontoon bridges across two of the rivers. General Adele-De-Garbo took advantage of this and made several desperate attempts to penetrate the main christian lines before Dorothy Gale. He succeeded in undermining some of the principal fortifications, and on the morning of June the last, the two whole christian fortifications with works and fortifications all around with two million three hundred thousand men was blown high into the air. When a most heavy cannonade was opened upon the remainder of the works with great effect. But the big assaults which followed were failures on account of the fierce resistance of the defense defenders. Soon after this general Adele-De-Garbos army was massed on the left of the Angelinians, south of the Erminie, and made an attack upon the main christian works on Herdrudes run. But after a severe contest of all days duration they were repulsed by generalinian Arouburg, and on July the fourth, with drew to their main intrenchments. Very little was done after that until generalinian Arouburg started to move against Adele-De-Garbo himself a month later.

A little later after the disastrous battles just mentioned between Adele-De-Garbo and generalinian Arouburg started on his own big movement for Ozma and Angelinia Agathia on June the sixth 1918. He had a force of nearly one hundred million men, distributed in the army of Glandelinia, led by general G.H. Brown, the army of generalinians, led by general J.B. Bel Benligan, and the big army of Omarians, commanded by general J.M. Bellie.

Moving southward from Mombi general Beppo Evans came upon a christian force of nearly fifty five million men strongly posted at Punkin centre, at the junction of two railroads leading into east and west Ozma state. This force was commanded by general Henry Joseph Darger, and was arranged in three immense corps under generals Angelio A Jennings, Heunie Costello, and Estrabrook Johnson. Indeed as the position of this christian force was deemed immensely too strong to be forced by or warrant any attack in front, general Beppo Evans maneuvered its flanks by seeking a passage through Erminie Hill Gap, on the left. This was completely successful and the Angelinians retreated to a point near Ozma Railroad station, at the Ostania river on the main line of the Mic-Hollister and Pandore railroad, between Ozma and Angelinia Agathia. General Angelio Jennings was driven across this stream by the Glandelinians after a hard fight on June the sixteenth, and being pursued by general G.H. Brown and Benligan he fled through the Caldwell Junction Pass, where he took up a strong position on the other side of the Atlantic river. The opposing armies then took a short rest on opposite banks of the stream. General Beppo Evans now attempted to flank the Angelinians out of their strong position by concentrating his forces west of them at Ozma.

Journey. This movement led to a desperate battle near that place however neither side gained any victory, and when the darkness stopped the bloody fight, general Jennings strongly intrenched himself, through a broken but thickly wooded country, from Ozma Journey to Marianne. After a weeks severe fighting between these two places, general Henry Joseph Darger the main christian commander was compelled to leave the Caldwell Junction Pass July the first 1918. General Beppo Evans then took possession of the works, garrisoned it, and rebuilt the many bridges that Darger had burned and blew up during his flight. The gaps made in Beppo Evans army by the losses in the numerous engagements were filled up by the arrival on the eighth of troops under general Izner Myletze.

General Beppo Evans then pushed on with his strengthened Glandelinian army, and although general Henry Darger contested his onward march at every point at which he could manage to make some stand, the 8 Angelinians were driven after a month of desolate desperate fighting, from Bazey, Gobbin Heights or hills, and from Germanine, Turner town, down toward the Erminie North Bend in the direction of Ozma. In these struggles the Glandelinians lost heavily and so did the Angelinians, among the killed at the battle of Erminie's North Bend being general Bernard Hanson Handson. One of their corps commanders. When general Henry Joseph Darger reached the stream, general Beppo Evans rode into Marlean and at once planned and prepared to strike a most severe blow on his Christian enemy and antagonist, while he was crossing that river. But general Darger was too quick and skillful to allow this, and he swiftly passed the stream and made a desperate stand along the line of it. After terrible and much desperate fighting he was soon forced from this position, and retreated rapidly to a new line that covered Ozma, his left resting on the Winkie and his right on the Erminie. While there, general Beppo Evans heard that his superior general Adele-de-Carhe had been needed by general John Manley elsewhere badly and had been transferred in western Calvari Calverinia to join his own while general Maldon Convention yognonia had been sent from Calverinia to take Adele-de-Carhe's place. After a short rest the Glandelinians toward the end of June or July began advancing furiously again, and after destroying some railroads found still intact, and taking part in a thousand heavy skirmishes, they were attacked by the Angelinian forces on the twenty 20th. General Henry Joseph Darger himself led the attack, which was directed generally upon the whole line of Beppo Evans' army, and especially against the corps of general Benlign and Gobbinhead. The battle was an extremely fierce one indeed and both sides suffered immensely, but the Christian assailants were severely repulsed. General Beppo Evans then moved rapidly toward Ozma town. On the way he encountered some strong intrenchments, and while attacking a party of general Darger's army behind them he was struck a most severe blow in the rear by the main army of that Angelinia army led by general August Darger, who had by a long night march passed around him. The blow indeed was a crushing one, but after a most sanguinary battle lasting many hours in which the losses on both sides were dreadful in the dreadful in the extreme, the Glandelinians were victorious, and succeeded in driving the Angelinians back to their works with the loss of twenty generals killed. The Christian general J.P. Allenberger was shot dead while he tried to rally his army. He was therefore succeeded in the command of the army by general Richard Logan.

A few days later, July the twenty fourth, the Angelinians again made a most fierce attack, and were again sent back to their main lines with dreadful slaughter, and after another heavy loss in generals and other officers and a large number of battle scarred standards. This put a stop to active hostilities for a few weeks. Then on August the fifteenth, the decisive battle that gave the Glandelinian army finally a chance to take possession of Ozma works was fought. The forces of Beppo Evans and Darger met on that day at Rosa and near Topsy, twenty miles below the city of Ozma, when the Glandelinians being defeated, and their ten miles stretch of mobilization camps and works being set on fire by a dreadful bombardment, general Darger blew up all the works and powder and ammunition dumps at Ozma town and forming a junction with general August Darger or recrossed the Erminie with his whole army. General Beppo Evans then entered the badly battered town of Ozma on the twenty fourth of August.

The two opposing divisions of the main armies now rested for another short time, with only the river between them, and most of September was given up to reorganization of both sides. When hearing that general Henry Darger contemplated the recapture of Ozma, Beppo Evans sent Izner Myletze and Convention to a point called Three Rivers, and concentrate a new force of troops there. General Henry Darger in the meantime descended upon Caldwell Pass, and attempted to capture the stores there. He failed most disgracefully. General Beppo Evans now planned a more vigorous movement against Darger. He therefore turned over the command of a very large portion of his troops to general Izner Myletze, and then started out on the morning of September the 10th. General Hardine with five million cavalry led the way, followed by Beppo Evans with six hundred and fifty million in two three columns, commanded respectively by general Benlign and Gobbinhead. They marched and attacked for more than a week moving in two big columns, with wings extending nearly sixty miles, the Angelinians everywhere being bewildered, and at some points offered but little opposition. Upon reaching the northeast corner of the Winkie river general Evans attacked and captured Fort Mary Mac-Allister, and a little later he compelled the quick evacuation by August Darger of Savannah Junction, which general Beppo Evans entered the next day.

A few months before this general Truman Beech, Kirben, was sent by general Darger of the enemy side to assist a part of the Glandelinian army to drive the Angelinians under general John Leader out of that region of Glorinia so that the siege of Angelinia Agathia could be pressed a little closer, and thus insure the speedy capture of the city and Angelinian capital. General Truman Kirben went up the St. Peter's river and managed to drive the Angelinians under general Leader from the works of Glorinia and into the interior of the Min-Holler works. After a hot pursuit general Kirben came upon the Angelinians strongly posted in the heart of a Angelinian Or Cypress swamp, at Worm Ant Ander Station. He made a fierce attack on the fifth of June but was repulsed, and fell back to his own point after destroying on the Angelinians $10,000,000 worth of property. At the same time general Hokun Spokes assisted by the Angelinian warships and other squadrons made a most successful assault upon the rebel fleet south of Nombi then held by general Glandorn troops of six million men. The Christian fleet was a powerful one all right, and for several months previous to the beginning of the siege had kept all waterways of Angelinia Agathia free from rebel gunboats and other ships. The destruction of this Christian fleet of a hundred ships was very much desired by the Glandelinian generals directing the siege of Angelinia Agathia, and this was accomplished with great skill and bravery by Admiral Hammon Washington of the rebel fleet of torpedo boat chasers and some submersibles. He with thirteen thirteen ships on the night of July the fifteenth took his torpedo squad and a squadron of torpedo boats up into the Nombi river harbor, and reaching the near approach of the Christian fleet succeeded in sending six torpedoes under the hull of the Christian ships one by one with quick accuracy and blowing up each ship with fatal effect during a severe battle with artillery on shore and from Christian fortifications beyond. Indeed all the time during the shooting of the torpedoes the brave Glandelinian fleet were subjected to a terrific hail of shot and shell and high explosives, fired from shore batteries and forts by the alarmed Angelinians, who although they could see nothing in the darkness except the flashes of the ships being destroyed and the flames starting up heard the movements of their Glandelinian foes, and directed their broadsides in the direction of the sounds. Admiral Washington and thirteen hundred of his men after his own ships were badly wrecked and on fire, or sinking, after the damage work was done, escaped to a number of big hidden cutters that accompanied the fleet of rebel gunboats, while the others of the fearless fleet were killed or wounded and drowned. General Darger after his unsuccessful attempts to regain the camps near Ozma town and to seize the stores near Caldwell Pass prepared for another counter advance. Late in September he recrossed the Winkie river, near Florence Girl Knoll, and pushed vigorously on toward Ozma with fifty million troops. At Min-Pitersonia town he came to the intrenchments of general Izner Myletze who was trying to impede his advance so that he could get himself and troops to that village before they did. General Darger reached Min-Pitersonia on the afternoon of September 30th 1914, and at once charged on general Izner Myletze's position so desperately and with such force, that after a desperate battle of great violence his whole army was driven from their works. But they quickly rallied, and two days more of desperate fighting, enabled the Glandelinians to make a gallant dash and recover their lost ground, and also three hundred thousand prisoners.

General Joseph Henry Darger of the rebels was then placed in charge of the captured works at Ozma town. On August the fifteenth, general Jack Evans came upon the scene and moved forward to drive the Glandelinians away. His own left wing under general Hertrude made a most vigorous attack, and soon compelled a portion of Beppo Evans' army to retreat to the foot of the Batai Bohlin Hills or height where he was again assailed by the sea army under Evans, and other armies of troops the following days. The battle of Ozma was terrible and raged with Beppo Evans' whole army and with the armies of Darger and Jack Wans. But the result was soon seen that the broken fragments of the christian armies thus battling so fiercely all day was sent flying northward in great confusion with both general Jack Evans and Darger seriously wounded. The christian armies under these commanders were closely pursued, and at the close of the next day General August Darger with the remnants of the shattered christian army under his brother and Jack Evans escaped across the Erminia River and retreated toward Angelinia Agathia. During this conflict Beppo Evans captured eleven million five hundred thousand christians as prisoners, and one thousand two hundred and seventy two pieces of artillery, and inflicted a serious loss in killed and wounded to the Angelinians or more than 20,000,000 men. His own loss in that tremendous battle was about 10,000,000.

DESPITE THE LENGTH THE ENEMY WERE ABLE TO CONTINUE RE SIEGE OF ANGELINIA DURING THE LATE THIRD AND EARLY FOURTH YEAR OF THE WAR. thousand of different different christian warships and cruisers, merchantmen, and gunboats and war craft of every possible description in description made great havoc among the glandelinian transport ships, especially in the latter months of the great sieges etc etc.

At the beginning of the month of November 1916 they had captured one hundred and ninety three Glandelinian warships, and a large number of glandelinian transports whose cargoes were valued at $123,145,666,567. The most formidable of these plundering christian fleets was a big one under Admiral Zimmermann, whose ships were built, armed and fully provisioned by his main fleets further off which were besieging yivin vivian wickey by the water way. The fleet was also under Admiral Mio-Hollesster and Commodore Raphael Anderton, of Abyssinkile.

For three months this big fleet or two big fleets of Angelinian warships sailed up and down the various rivers before Angelinia and gorothy G 1 gals, plundering and burning hundreds of glandelinian transports, and always eluding the main Glandelinian fleets sent out in search of the christian fleets. At length Admiral John A Kainsbury of the Glandelinian fleet called the guard who had sought these two dangerous christian fleets of a warship high and low heard that the fleets had put out or into the port near Mombet. He immediately took his fleet of thirty ships to that point or place and lying off outside and near the harbor awaited the reappearance of the christian fleets. When the two christian fleets came out and steamed down the river the glandelinian fleet moved out down the river a certain distance, and then gave battle to the two christian fleets. The two christian christian fleets and the one glandelinian fleet fought each other desperately for for six hours pouring broadside after broadside into each other with a thunderous roar. It was the most desperate and terrific battle between ships ever witnessed before and though the glandelinian fleet though much smaller than the single christian fleet had much bigger and stronger battleships battleships and many more guns, all of the rebel fleet was soon sinking or its ships disabled. The survivors of the crews of the glandelinian ships were picked up by other rebel ships mostly transports, which had hovered near to be in readiness for such an emergency, and taken safely to the main rebel lines, where where the glandelinian admiral was feted and presented with a sword as a token of sympathy and esteem.

The victory of the two Angelinian fleets stirred up up the authorities of the Angelinian National governments to a determination to close all the passageways of the rivers and all their ports, and other points then still open for blockade runners. The intentions of the Angelinians were to capture the ports of forts Hertrude and former St John in possession of the rebels.

To close the latter port and capture that fort general Calhoun Hodges sent a force of five million to troops, under general Hunter from porothy Gale to co-operate with Admiral Zimmerman's fleet of one hundred and eighteen river warships, which after the defeat of the glandolinian fleet appeared off the entrance of Fortrona Herdrude on August the fifth 1914. These vessels four of which were long flat boats turned into floating batteries protected by immense shields of iron then rushed in past Fort Herdrude and Fort St John and the most terrific fire from all their great guns ... All Zimmerman gave all his most quickest and best vessels through a small tube hole from the mainmast top of his immense flag-ship, (the Gertrude Angelina), where he and several of his officers appeared to be lashed to the rigging, to keep him and his officers from being disabled by the shock of great guns and his little fishes. He and they like Farragut at Hobe Mobile remained in that most perilous position during the entire voyage and battle past the forts and back and forth again for two days. He made the final passage in safety although six of his big ships was destroyed by the guns of Fort Herdrude. He was then attacked by a strong fleet of glandolinian ships, but after a severe and more noisy fight, they were annihilated.

A simultaneous assault of greater violence was now made on Fortrona. Cinders fell all around it and the other two forts being badly reduced were surrendered August the 27th. A little more than one week later the immense fortifications all around Ozma were recaptured and all approaches to Ozma and vicinity was completely and effectually guarded. Ozma was taken however this important movement resulting in the recapture of Ozma by the Angolinians had not or was not undertaken until September 19th. When a strong force of soldiers were sent against the fortifications in the possession of Beppo Evans. It was also composed of Admiral Mic-Hol's Christian fleet, and other land troops, from general Jack Evans main army under general Godfrey Cannon. He broke his toe, the first expedition and assaults were complete and bloody failures, but another fierce attempt was made the following week, with the same forces and the same fleet, and land troops under general Rodney James Graves.

This though resulting in a bloody battle of two days duration, and an explosion that looked like a volcanic outburst, was a brilliant and complete success, the fortresses and fortifications were surrendering on the fifteenth, and with the retreat of Beppo Evans' army the Angolinian army again entered Ozma town on the twenty second of the month.

At the same time general Jimmie Vivian had started on a rapid march through the region toward Mombi and passed on almost unopposed, until he reached the glandolinian strongholds, where he captured a line of glandolinian works.

Upon learning of this general Pugnosa now in de la De-Garbas command at once withdrew his endangered army or forces from Chawabellano, and also from Trot and Betsy Bobbin, and fled toward Mombi to join the other glandolinian forces of general Granberry. General Jimmie Vivian then with his army divided into sections took possession of these towns, and a few days afterwards generally a son Vivian saw again the flags of Angolinia placed over the towns. Jimmie Vivian then pressed on into the northern vicinity of Mombi. On the way he met a force of 20,000,000 Gooddiers under general Joseph Henry Darger. The conflict was severe but not decisive and after the enemy recoiled general Jimmie Vivian reached Burnsville and rested during the night. When he pushed onward again but at Banded Norm he was surprised by the whole of Darger's army, which suddenly attacked a part of his force under general Hanson Jennings. There was a most terrible battle for three days. Think of it, and the most dreadful slaughter, sixty times did the combined forces of Gooddiers under generals, Hokus Spu Spokus, Burns, Burns Bridge, Bob Bunder, Bob Bunderline, Bicknell Remeline, Butler Phelan, and Fisher, Bernard ussel, and Butcher Ouse fier fall fiercely upon the Angolinian forces, and nothing but the most desperate efforts and most hardest fighting, saved general Jimmie Vivian's army from destruction. For those three days his troops made the most bravest stands against the successive assaults of the enemy, repelling them with cannon and musketry, and at length succeeded in gaining the victory, the glandolinians suffering enormous losses and sixty generals and thousands of officers retreating to Moleo abandoning Mombi which was now in possession of the Christians again. Leaving a portion of the army there general Jimmie Vivian went on with the rest toward Goldenlocks where he was joined by general Germaine Vivian and Jack Evans after which he hastened to Mombi point to consult his father in regard to future operations. The town of Mombi having been closed and captured plans were immediately made for the recapture of that city and the rest of the region by the enemy. General Beppo Evans who commanded his army yet having been reinforced by general Pugnosa started forward with twenty five million men, at the same time that general Henry Sparr and Joseph Henry Darger sent from their armies thirteen million horsemen, and about two million foot soldiers, under general Bell Bellion to co-operate with him. While general Darger was attempting the destruction and reduction of the works of Mombi, general Beppo Evans and his army swept down from the north northern end of the Erminia river and made a fierce attack but was repulsed with frightful loss. While this was going on general Hanson Vivian received reports that general Vivian was way up in Calvernia on the enemy's side had been moving toward Angolinia Agathia to reinforce general Pugnosa, and had raided two thousand seven hundred and sixty miles through the states of Ozma, Angeline Vine and Jordan, capturing many cities and towns, and destroying an immense amount of public and private property. He also succeeded in keeping general Geddaine's Christian army cowering from moving down northward to assist the besieged Angolinians at Angolinia Agathia. So though general Beppo Evans encouraged by this news also managed to finally capture Mombi again and cause its downfall anew, a part of his army attacked on both the front, rear and flank by a portion of general Jack Evans' army fled up the Erminia river with nine million troops and was annihilated by Christian batteries.

Again by the Christians Mombi was retaken, and with the city were taken five million prisoners, and fifty thousand one hundred and fifty cannon. It was evident now that for the remainder of the siege all conflict within the region of Mombi was now ended.

Although the two immense armies of general Hanson Vivian and Pugnosa had remained in comparative quiet in front of a porothy Gale, Angolinia Agathia and Ozma since the recapture of Ozma the Christian forces effectually prevented a junction of Beppo Evans with general Pugnosa. General Hanson Vivian seeing now or for sure that the enemy's great siege of Angolinia Agathia was about broken at length determined to make a general and vigorous movement against general Pugnosa in person and capture him and his whole army. Late in September he ordered general Germaine Vivian, then on the extreme right of Ozma with his brother Jimmie Vivian, to move up and destroy if possible all communications with general Beppo Evans and Pugnosa, and if possible recapture

Kitchens, Kitchens, where a large number of glandolinian stores and supplies were hidden. General Neldinia was to lead the raid in person. With general Walter Jennings and Posvillian Johnston, and ten million men on foot and horse, the two Vivians Germaine and Jimmie set out with Gronburg and left porothy Gale on the twenty seventh and going up the valley suddenly encountered Joseph Henry Darger's forces at Terrytown. After a battle there he scattered his enemies, and then crossed the Blue Berry fields, and destroyed a line of railroad as far as MEVA St. Clare. Finding at that time the town of Bleedinglinger too strong for him to attack, he divided his force, one party going up to break the railroad toward that all town, and the other to disable the Erminia river canal, by which the glandolinian army received large portions of supplies andplies.

General Put Pugnosa now saw that it was absolutely necessary for him to form a junction with general Beppo Evans if he wished to save his glandolinian army from capture, and so concentrating his forces near general Hanson Vivian's centre in front of Ozma town and Betsy Bobbin on September the twenty fifth, made a desperate assault upon his whole line, hoping by the capture of that point of works to regain Ozma and Betsy Bobbin so as to be able to break through the Christian line and accomplish a successful retreat northward. But after a desperate battle raging all day he was unsuccessful, general Hanson Vivian's army, completely prepared for him, and defeating him with the most heavy loss.

Earlier than this general Meldinia Aronburg was ordered to take his cavalry on a great raid into the southern territory of the besieging rebels, for the purpose of assisting general Robert Vivian the main christian commander of all, but finding the latter in no need of any help whatever, Aronburg moved eastward and destroyed the Abyssinkilian and Abbeannian railroad for some distance toward Evangeline at glare, after which he immediately turned southward with his army and destroyed the railroad between Kittens ischerts and Garnation ridge. Some of his troops went as far as Big girl Knool in the hope of releasing a large number of Angelinian prisoners there. But the soldiers who were prisoners there were removed before general Aronburg's men arrived, and although the Angelinian raiders destroyed a vast amount of rebel provisions, they did not accomplish their purpose. Then when general Aronburg pushed into the eastern section of the Ozma state, a part of his force on October the ninth destroyed six magnificent bridges which across the Erminis river extended a mile. This raid results resulted in the capture of six million prisoners, six thousand three hundred and thirty one pieces of artillery and a very large number of small arms and large stores of provisions.

It was now evident and hoped for that the siege of Angelinia, which had now come to an end. The glandelinian army under general Pugnacia which had with the rest besieged Angelinia Agathia and porothy Gale, was now itself being fast hemmed in by other christian armies suddenly moving up from the south. Even during the siege of Angelinia Agathia and many other times before during the early third and fourth year of the great war many desperate efforts had been made to bring about a peace without the conquering of any of the glandelinian armies, but they had all failed. Six times the government of glandelinia had sent in petitions to general Vivian the main ruler of Angelinia, and also to King Gannon P. Proclle his assistant but neither any one of these Angelinian rulers would listen to no conditions: conditions whatever, except absolute and prompt submission, everywhere within the boundaries of the Angelinian and glandelinian kingdoms to the National Authorities and also the entire ending and abolition of all child slavery and its horrors and effects...

During the time Angelinia Agathia was besieged as here we write written King K glandlin of glandelinia in answer to an abrupt appeal from Francis Turner Jamesonia of Abbeannia, near the close of the month september, said if possible he would be willing to enter into a big conference or convention with all the Angelinian rulers, and generals, with a full view to secure peace between the two Angelinian nations. Though all the others of the Angelinian authorities opposed his view, general Hanson Vivian governor ruler of Angelinia expressed his willingness to have a conference if it was a view to secure immediate peace for the hope of ending child slavery and for the giving up to the "Mercy of the Angelinian Authorities of Abyssinkile" all those among the glandelinian generals and men who had been guilty of the work of such wanton destruction of child life and so much property throughout Calverinia and southern and north hern Angelinia. Although King glandlin did not certainly like the latter's expression he appointed as commissioners Alexander Jean Trouve, John A. Graveures, and R.M.D. Lessuer. The conference when it was held about two months later was without hope and completely fruitless, as Governor Hanson Vivian would not recede from the position he had then taken. Indignant indeed beyond anything anything at this result the glandelinian king declared at a tremendous public meeting in glandelinia City where millions of men women and children were assembled "I at once than give up child slaves to the Christian world for homes and parents and sooner than be united to the Angelinian States again, he would be willing to yield up everything he had on earth, and if it were possible he would even sacrifice his very life like a million times before he would give him or allow his nation to do so." Then at the same meeting it was firmly resolved that the whole glandelinian nation would never lay down its arms until its independence was won and they could do as they liked about child slavery and keep as many child slaves as they wished and treat them as they liked....

Upon general Meldinia Aronburg's return from his great raid at the close of May or July please, general Hanson Vivian at the advice of his Brother Robert Vivian, started the army of Angelinia on a most grand movement against the main glandelinian left. On the morning of July the thirteenth please general Aronburg that is concentinian Aronburg, with his big force of cavalry and an immense corps of infantry moved forward and took possession of a line of woods with five streams running through the through it called bleedinglinger. While general Vivian advanced toward Kittens ischerts still in the possession of the foe... The latter drove the Scodler glandelinian before them in a good fight, but they quickly rallied, and attacked his army so fiercely and so vigorously that general Evans St Clare's division, which had the advance advance fell back in utmost confusion on general Crawford Chamberlaines corps and artillery battalion, which in turn were soon driven back with great loss on to the division of Abyssinkilians under general Turnerama Pugnacia. There the enemy's big onslaught was completely checked, and a division of general Aronburg's corps being sent to the support of these three christian columns they at once reformed their troops, and with a sudden wild dash of fury, regained the lost ground, and then resuming the battle by a fierce attack upon the enemy under general Bender recaptured Kittens ischerts and captured the whole glandelinian army there who had been in possession with thirteen generals and an enormous number of glandelinian colors and six hundred cannons and three million wagons, and a large store of provisions and ammunition. It was elating indeed. General Concentinian Aronburg had also been assaulted fiercely by the enemy at bleedinglinger and was driven back for two miles and a half with great loss, and himself losing his best horse which had been killed under him, but only for a time for with the aid of general Henry Dargers army and the fifth corps under Jimmie Vivian, he again rallied his defeated army and advanced to recapture his lost ground. The battle was resumed along his own line with dreadful and sanguinary fury, and after tough fighting desperately against great odds all day long the glandelinians were driven back from the works they had captured and from all the ground they had won, and not only that but also driven from their own strong line of works to which they retreated and made a stand, and then were completely routed, the Angelinian fifth and sixth corps and Jimmie Vivian's divisions doubling up the left and right in flanks of the enemy in confusion and the Concentinian cavalry under general Henry Agathia dashing on to Kittens ischerts, capturing the left grand position of the enemy and their artillery, and turning it upon the fleeing insurgents and mow mowing down their very columns as they fled. The whole line in position near Kittens ischerts soon took to flight in disordered fashion, leaving behind them over five million of their troops as prisoners of war. The fugitives were pursued westward about six miles or more by the Concentinian cavalry under general Agathia, and by the Abyssinkilian cavalry under general Beppo Lansins. General Hanson Vivian heard of this tremendous victory in his own position before Little girl Knool and at once ordered a most general bombardment along his whole line against that city and the enemy's works, to be kept up for two days and nights without ceasing. It was a tremendous cannonading indeed and the following morning after the artillery duel the works of the enemy were vigorously attacked. General Double Day Federal with his corps and other divisions rushing forward like a tremendous cyclone in fury managed to break through the rebel lines, and pushing on drove the whole glandelinian confederate before him, captured several thousand guns and a large division of glandelinians as prisoners, and completely and effectually crushed general Pugnacia's right and left. General Hanson Pugnacia of the Abyssinkilian Winkies and with the Abbeannian fifth corps had meanwhile by making a general assault carried the enemy's main line in the front, but was checked with tremendous loss at the second line, while a part of general Hanson Vivian's corps and cavalry by a most gallant but destructive charge captured ten strong works south of Little girl Knool. The battle of Little girl Knool now raged furiously from right to left in general violence, the glandelinians bravely and most desperately fighting to hold their works and intrenchments. Especially more determined than ever were they to retain possession of the fortified works of the outlying village of Peterine which was defended by general Picknell Tamarlines corps.

In the gallant stand he made general picknell Tamerline was killed and his corps almost annihilated. General Concentinian Aronburg now came up rapidly from the west, and sweeping down upon the flank and rear of the rebel line, forced them to give up the bloody and desperate contest and fly in utmost confusion. That day general Beppo Evans was attending a convention of his own generals in Gathlinger town ten miles south of Mombi, when an orderly hurried into his room even without being admitted and handed him an important message from general Pugnoscia Bicknell. With a sudden glance the Glandelinian general saw all was over in his attempts to capture Angelinia-Agathia. He must immediately seek safety of his own army in flight as Little Girl Knool and general Bicknell's big Glandelinian army would soon be taken. He notified general John Manley of the danger and asked whether he would or should move his army to try and regain the imperiled Glandelinian army, asking by telegraph but Manley warned him that it would be utterly impossible, and that the expedition for his own safety and for the safety of Glandelinia's cause must be abandoned. So at nine o'clock in the same evening general Beppo Evans and his army abandoned their main works south of Mombi and fled northward in the direction of Evangeline St. Clare to which city his wife and children had gone a few days before for protection as it was said from the fiercer Angelinian soldiery. The Glandelinian Congress at Glorinia and Mombi, and Kittens, Richerts, and the Gargoylian Legislature also took flight. Early the next morning general Jimmie Vivian in command of the forces of Angelinia on the side north of the Erwinde Creek marched into Little Girl-Knool with hands playing, and colors flying.

His main army composed in part of Abyssinkilian troops, was immediately set to work to put out the big fires kindled by the Glandelinian incendiaries, just after the hasty evacuation, and which had destroyed about five thousand houses. General Jimmie Vivian indeed found that the Glandelinians had abandoned five million of their sick and wounded in the hospitals, and had left as grand trophies, in the region five hundred thousand pieces of artillery standing close together in or in parks for many miles, thousands of locomotives, and millions of passenger coaches all pullmans, and suburbs and local besides, and hundreds of thousands of freight cars besides millions of wagons, and a large amount of other military public property, together with a part of the main archives of the Glandelinian government then residing there during the time it was in their possession. When general Jimmie Vivian reached the Little Girl Knool Courthouse, one of his staff general Walter John Jennings ascended to the roof and unfurled the Angelinian National flag, and Little Girl-Knool was once more in the hands of the Federal authorities of Angelinia. The news of the recapture of Little Girl-Knool and her surrounding towns and the breaking of the siege of Angelinia Agathia, and the capture of a vast Glandelinian army and all the supplies, trains and prisoners, produced great joy throughout the National States and countries of Angelinia, Abyssinkile and Abbeannia, for it told of the downfall of the besieging armies there. In all cities of Abbeannia and Abyssinkile and Angelinia the public offices were closed, the people of the cities and even in country towns showed their pleasure in public meetings, and in the ringing of bells of all churches, the explosions of billions of firecrackers, the soaring of a cloud of sky rockets at night, and the lusty cheers of millions of children children who flaunted as many pretty flags, finding that he no longer could hope to regain Little Girl-Knool or even hold his other positions a mile south of there general Pugnoscia Bicknell sent the message which general Beppo Evans had received while holding his council, and then silently withdrew from his position on the evening of August the second please.

At dawn the very next day the Angelinian forces learned of his retreat, but as he had gone too far they did not at once get within range of him though they did at once set out to intercept him. General Jimmie Vivian pushed for the Mombi Crossroad, followed by his brother with his divisions, while general Concentinian Aronburg hastened along the whole stretch of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora railroad toward Glendale (Calverinia) where that and the Mombi Crossroad intersect, a distance of sixty three miles from Ozma and Dorothy Gale. General Pugnoscia Bicknell was also making for that place, so as to be able to join general Beppo Evans at Eva St. Clare. The Angelinian forces however had the main inside tracks and reached there first. The two Vivian generals Jimmie and Germaine gained a position above G. Trot and Betsy Bobbin, and thus cut off general Bicknell's avenue of escape. While Concentinian Aronburg stopped below. General Pugnoscia's position now became utterly desperate. He was at Patsy Bobbin junction, and seeing that he could not advance by any of the broken railroads, or even in any other way he swung around to the northeast, and struck the road again at Trotville. Here the head of this column was met by two divisions of infantry, and a large force of Abyssinkilian cavalry, under general Theodore Linguist, who had been hurried forward to hold the Angelinian Confederates under until general Concentinian Aronburg could come up with the rest of his corps. The battle was terrific and horrible but the Angelinians managed to accomplish this though general Linguist of the Christians fell dead shot through the heart. When general Concentinian Aronburg arrived with his army general picknell had intrenched himself.

General Hanson Vivian and his army now reached Trotville, and also Trot and Betsy Bobbin and Glinda, and on the seventh of September wrote a note to general Pugnoscia Bicknell in which he said;]]

"Your Honorable Excellency

General Henry Pugnoscia Bicknell;

Sir, The result of the past twelve months of the hopeless and bloody siege of Angelinia Agathia must now I hope convince you and your generals and your whole Scodler Glandelinian army of the hopelessness of further resistance on the part of the army of Glandelinia in this struggle going on. Whether you think so or not, or whether you feel so or not I myself think and feel that it is so and regard it a plain and convincing duty before the world in general of mine and my assistance to shift from myself and my own nation in general the responsibility of any further shedding of blood, by now asking of you the quick surrender of that portion of the Glandelinian army known as the Scodler Army of Gargolia."

General Hanson Angelic Vivian.
Commander of Angelinian army.

General Pugnoscia made reply to this in saying that he did not and could not believe that further resistance of his army was hopeless, but nevertheless seeing his army already surrounded by the main Christian army, and seeing general Beppo Evans had been come compelled by Manley's blunder to double-cross him, he therefore reciprocated the desire to avoid useless shedding of blood, and therefore before considering the Angelinian generals terms of surrender or proposition, he demanded the terms Hanson would offer on condition of the surrender of the whole Glandelinian army under his gracious command."

Now however without waiting a minute for general Hanson Vivian's reply General Pugnoscia Bicknell managed to steal away in the night toward Anna Worth hoping to escape to the shelter of the mountainous and wooded country beyond that town. Early the next morning the Angelinian armies set out in pursuit.

The retreat of the enemy was vigorous and lasted three days, and during the retreat many skirmishes occurred in which the Angelinians were always victorious. And while on this desperate northeastward movement general Pugnoscia received general Hanson Vivian's answer which was confirmed by his brother signing his name on the letter, and in which general Hanson said;

"Your Excellency general Pugnoscia/
General in chief of Scoodler army,
August the thirteenth 1914.

Sir;
You know there is only one condition that I and my brother and the government insists on, namely that the whole army of men and officers surrendered, should be retained as prisoners of war until war is over in general or until properly and fairly exchanged. And that those guilty of the Posa, Popsy and Pittens Piercherts massacres shall be justly punished when detected."

General Hanson Vivian.
Commander of army of Angelina."

General Hanson Vivian then at the advice of his brother proposed a meeting to arrange definite terms for the surrender of the army of Glandelinian Scoodlers and to ask at what point the meeting should be held, if there was to be a meeting under a flag of truce. General Pugnoscia then wrote back that on some way or other he had not as yet intended to propose to the surrender of his army. He wrote in this manner;

"To His Gracious Excellency general Hanson Anglia Vivian, Commander of Federal Army of Angelina,
August 14th, 1914.

Sir
To be frank general Hanson Vivian, I nor my generals do not as yet think the emergency has as yet arisen to call for the surrender of my Scoodler army of Glandelinia----but as the sole or the restoration of peace should be the sole object of all between us two at least, if not with the whole nations of Glandelinia and Angelina, I and my generals desire to know whether your proposals, would lead to that end. As the whole of Glandelinia is not surrendered therefore, I cannot I'm sure without general Manley's orders meet you with a view to surrender the Scoodler army of Glandelinia, but as far as your proposal may affect the Angelinian Confederate States of Glandelinia, and the Glandelinian Confederate State forces under my full command, and tend to the restoration of peace at least between us two rivals, I should be pleased to meet you at two P.M. to morrow afternoon, on the old Meldon road near St Gertrudes Orphan Asylum, between the main picket lines of the two armies."

General Pugnoscia Picknell.

Commander of Scoodler
army of Glandelinia."

However general Hanson Vivian nor his brother would not listen to an interview of any kind on this basis, as having no authority to treat on the topic of peace, he and his brother indeed saw that such a meeting would be completely useless if not foolish.

7520
However, general Robert Vivian and his generals held a council and so did general Hanson Vivian and it was decided that general Pugnoscia should immediately submit to terms of "Unconditional surrender or have his army annihilated for his foolishness. Therefore general Hanson Vivian again wrote to the rebel general;

General Pugnoscia;
Commander of Glandelinian army;
Sir;

"The only terms upon which peace can be had between me and you are to be well understood in this letter. By all your army laying down their arms and submit as pri pri prisoners of war, and for me to do as I see fit for those who are responsible for the massacres, the both of us commanders, me and you can surely hasten for me and you the most desirable event, save millions of human lives, and hundreds of millions of Glandelinian dollars worth of property not yet destroyed."

General
Hanson Vivian.

General Jimmie Vivian and Concentinian Aronburg had by this time already reached a strong position across general Pugnoscia's path, near Betsy Robbin, so now there was no way for the latter to escape except by cutting through general Concentinian Aronburg's main line. Indeed he made a brave and most desperate effort to do this on the morning of August the eighteenth. The battle of course was sanguinary and for a time a part of Concentinian Aronburg's line was broken but with the aid of general Germaine Vivian and his brother's divisions, and with the main fifth or corps of Vivian's which had just had just come up general Concentinian Aronburg repulsed the assault of the Glandelinians with great loss, and therefore general Pugnoscia seeing no way of escape was compelled at last to give in. He wrote to general Robert Vivian in person;

"Your Majesty Robert Anglia Vivian;
I received your brother's note this morning; General Hanson Anglia Vivian, on one of my picket lines near Betsy Robbin before the battle, whether now I have come in person to meet you only and ascertain as near as possible, what terms were embraced by him in his proposals of yesterday with main reference to the surrender of this Scoodler Glandelinian army. I now ask an interview, in accordance with the offer contained in his letter of yesterday for that purpose. The interview with you only."

General Pugnoscia Picknell."

Arrangements were as soon as possible convenient allowed to be made, for the interview. The dwelling of Governor Henry Gales at the town of Betsy Robbin was selected for the purpose, and in the parlor of that mansion August the 29th 1914 the two generals finally met and discussed the terms of surrender, just in the same manner as two business men discuss the business topics. It was finally agreed that general Pugnoscia and all his generals should give their parole of honor not to take up further arms against the governments of Abbeannia and Angelina, until properly and fairly exchanged, that if trustworthy and not treacherous the officers of all rank would be allowed to keep their side arms, and even revolvers, baggage, money, and private horses, and that all the officers and even the men would not at all be molested or even disturbed or investigated against their will by any part of the Angelinian authorities or Government persons, so long as they should observe their parole and the Angelinian laws in force where they should reside as prisoners of war. So on August the 30th the whole Glandelinian army laid down its arms and surrendered.

The number of glandelinians soon to be paroled and sent back to their homes was about twenty five million. With the army of men were surrendered sixteen million small arms, one hundred and fifty thousand small pieces of artillery, 17,000 stands of glandelinian colors, about 11,000,000 wagons and caissons, and four million mules, and one million horses..

That same day on account of the activities of the Manley and other immense Glandelinian armies elsewhere especially in Calvernia the Angelinian War Departments of Angelinia, Abyssinkile, and Abbieannia, issued an order directing a sudden movement for all drafting and recruiting for the Angelinian National Armies, and of the purchasing of munitions of war, and supplies.

CHAPTER THREE

FOURTY EIGHT OR NINE.

GENERAL BERNARD HINDERLINE SURRENDERS TO GENERAL BUSTER SHOEMANN.----- HOSTILITIES IN THE VICINITY OF ANGELINIA AGATHIA ENDED.----- FLIGHT OF A NUMBER OF IMPORTANT MEN OF THE GOVERNMENT AUTHORITIES WHICH HAD MADE THEIR PLACE AT KITTENS RING HERTS, AND THEIR CABINET.----- THEY ARE CAPTURED CAPTURED.----- ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF GENERAL ROBERT ANGELIC VIVIAN.----- THE ANGELINIAN NAVY IN THE WAR.----- VIOLET AND HER SISTERS AND THEIR CARE OF MANY SICK AND WOUNDED OF BOTH SIDES.----- THE NOBLE ORGANIA OF ORGANIZATIONS.----- LIBERAL CONTRIBUTIONS OF THE PEOPLE OF ANGELINIA FOR GOOD AND BENEVOLENT WORK ON MANY BATTLEFIELDS THROUGHOUT THE WAR.----- SLAVERY OF MANY CHILD SLAVES IN THE WAR.----- A TREMENDOUS EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.----- PECULIAR POSITIONS OF THE ANGELINIAN GOVERNMENTS.----- TREATMENT OF ANGELINIAN PRISONERS IN MANY GLANDELINIAN PRISONS.----- A VERY UNFAIR AND UNHAPPY CHANGE.----- THE GLANDELINIAN PEOPLE.----- THE PURSUIT OF GENERAL BEPPO EVANS.

WHEN or while the surrender of general K Pugnosa picknell at Betsy Robbin Cour and Courthouse virtually ended the big siege of Angelinia Agathia, there was still a large army of glandelinians concentrated near Mombi, and smaller bodies elsewhere to be defeated or conquered before Angelinia Agathia could be considered safe from rebel armies. General Buster Shoemann who had been mainly in command of these points before the rebel army appeared to make the siege was preparing to march a large force of his army after the retreating army of Beppo Evans on the following week when he heard of the fall and surrender of Little Girl-Knool and the capture of the glandelinian army in charge there. This immediately changed his plans, and he at once prepared to turn his monstrous columns toward Baby Girl-Knool and march on the rebel army under general Bernard Hindernine, who retreated through Baby Girl-Knool along the course of the Mangeline street, large railroad westward toward Angeline Curren, whether the glandelinian authorities led by Ladden and his Cabinet had fled after making Mombi the seat of the glandelinian directing government for a few weeks. General Buster Shoemann pursued Hindernine as far as Baby Girl-Knool, where on the 1st of August, the latter having immediately heard of the overthrow of general Bicknell's army and the surrender of the latter general, finally requested a an interview interview with Shoemann for the main purpose of making terms of surrender. Indeed this was readily granted and after a meeting on the tenth of September 1914, a suspension of hostilities between the two was agreed upon, pending the ratification or rejection by the main glandelinian national or government of glandelinia of a basis of peace, arranged by the two generals. But the glandelinian king and his government authorities refused to accept the agreement, whereupon the glandelinian general Hindernine surrendered to Shoemann on the same generous terms as those granted to general picknell.

With these were surrendered about twenty five million men. One hundred and eight thousand pieces of cannon, and about fifteen million small arms fell into the hands of the Angelinians. A few days later, September the fourth please, general James Fowler of the glandelinians surrendered his glandelinian forces near Jennie Bridge to general Jimmie Vivian, and the glandelinian Navy in the Rminie river or creek was surrendered to Admiral Zimmermann at the same time. Hostilities around Angelinia Agathia then finally ended with a battle at Robbin Hood Creek on September 13th.

When Governor Ladden heard of the surrender of general picknell's army and of the others around Angelinia Agathia, and the retreat of general Beppo Evans at the blunder order of general Manley he immediately left Child Girl-Knool near Big-Girl-Knool with his whole Cabinet, and an escort of two million cavalry, and fled toward the northern part of the Calvernian countries hoping to encounter a vast rebel army and so escape the Angelinians.

they took with them a large number of captured children to be used as child slaves and these were under the charge of other Glandelinians and to elude the Christians should they pursue them for the same place in covered wagons, but along a different route. Upon reaching Glandorbia (Galverinia), the head of the escaping parties learned that some strong bodies of Angelinian soldiers had formed a plot to obtain the stolen children at any cost whatever and therefore immediately set out with half of his force of fugitives to protect the column guarding the children and to prevent them from being rescued. After a ride of eighteen miles and three quarters he joined the column of children and their captors at Glenorville, nearly due north from Glandorbia. General Jessie A. who was then at Glandor town not far away, heard of the flight of these important rebel personages and sent out two bodies of Geminian cavalry men, one under Colonel Franklinia and other officers and the others led by general Gna Plante and Mic-Horner to intercept the fugitives. As a reward of one million dollars had been offered by the Angelinian government authorities for the capture of Aladden and his hand of Glandelinians dead or alive, these two Christian force forces left no stone unturned to find them. They soon discovered his whereabouts and the location of his soldiers, and at early dawn the two Angelinian armies approached the camp where he and his cavalry were resting for the night, from opposite directions. There were then a number of severe battles, in which the Glandelinian cavalry forces were defeated with great loss, and this aroused the others. Aladden and his best followers tried to escape disguised as Galverinian citizens, but they were detected, and not surrendering themselves were shot and killed by the Angelinians. The children were regained and taken to the Christian lines and there placed under strong guard so Glandelinians could not take them again.

While the people of the Angelinian countries were rejoicing at the capture of one half of the Glandelinian army which had besieged Angelinia Agathia, and of the city being saved itself, and of the rout of Beppo Evans army and the surrender of the other, their joy was almost suddenly turned into sudden sorrow by the news of the attempted assassination of general Hanson Angolio Vivian.

and his brother also. The two great Angelinian commanders were seated in their headquarters at Angelinia Agathia discussing plans of leaving their vast armies at Angelinia Agathia for its protection and going north to take other armies and oppose the attacks and campaigns of the Manleys when an unknown Glandelinian spy attempted to escape with their important papers and when failing to do so fired at both generals. One bullet which missed Hanson struck this orderlie in the back of the head. The other shot aimed at Robert Vivian carried off a lock of his hair. When shouting "down with the Christian dogs!"

the rebel leaped out of the nearest window of the building, and reaching the street dashed down a narrow alley, and fled on a horse that was in readiness for him. He however was pursued by men with bloodhounds, and with the aid of two airships which detected his hiding place and was overtaken in a building near Dorothy Gale and shot dead by a number of Angelinians after he had resisted the party of pursuers for two days and night and killed single handed sixteen of them and wounded a hundred, out of their total number of two hundred men.

The orderlie who was shot instead died immediately that same night. His body was taken outside of Angelinia Agathia and buried as soon as possible. On the same night that the two generals had their narrow escape from being shot by the dangerous spy general Winstanley one of Hansons best generals was stabbed and stabbed and badly wounded by an accomplice of the spy, which gave rise to a belief that a plot had been arranged by some of the Glandelinian generals of some far distant camps or army, probably general Beppo Evans for the securing of all important plans about Angelinia Agathia and her surrounding posts, and maps and pictures of the places, as well as information and when the plan had failed the spies in making their escape had tried to murder all the men members of the generals and others. A number of strange persons seen within the Christian lines were immediately arrested on suspicion of being implicated with the das tardy plot and their trial resulted in the conviction and execution of five by hanging, and ten by shooting, while six others were sentenced to life imprisonment.

the surrender of the first two greatest of Glandelinian armies of the Glandelinian Confederacy which had helped Beppo Evans in the siege of Angelinia Agathia, and the preventing of the capture of Angelinia Agathia, effectually seemed already to have crushed a good section of the Glandelinian Confederacy forever.

This tremendous one y years years siege of Angelinia Agathia, which was more extended in area than any other siege of the war and more destructive of life and any property on account of the many severe battles than any other recorded in the war outside of the siege of Vivian Wickey, was over. The number of Angelinian soldiers totally engaged in the defense of Angelinia Agathia during the whole years siege was 222,666,989. According to the statement prepared by general Hanson Vivian and the Angelinian Authorities of Angelinia Agathia, the terrible number of casualties in the tremendous volunteer service and regular armies of the Angelinian forces during the whole year of resistance to the siege was as follows: killed in battle 16,767,058; killed in battle 16,767,058; died of fatal wounds, 32,743,011; died of shell shock and disease produced by wounds in battle 56,199,777; other causes such as accidents and so forth, 10,756,745. total died, 104,667,997.

The number of Glandelinian soldiers who died of wounds, or disease, or killed instantly in battle was about 133,789,320. statement of those who were killed was about 333,926. Number of Angelinian troops that were captured during the resistance to the siege was about 66,242,689. Glandelinian troops that were captured was about eleven million. The number of Angelinian troops that surrendered was about twenty million, one hundred and sixteen thousand, four hundred and thirty six. Angelinian troops that surrendered was about fifty million. The number of Angelinian troops that died while being prisoners was about three hundred and thirty five thousand, of Glandelinian troops 30,999.

One of the most grand and imposing scenes of the war indeed probably the whole Angelinian world ever heard of or the Angelinians ever witnessed, was the grand and imposing spectacle that was presented in Angelinia Agathia, when the millions of brave Angelinian and other national soldiers who had endured unspeakable hardships, and risked their very lives, health, and limbs, and even other horrors for the preservation of Angelinia Agathia, returned from the fearful fields of battle to go back to the encampments at Dorothy Gale, and Angelinia Agathia, and to restore those of Gema and Gittens Richerts. Everywhere in the city of Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale, they were received with expressions of gratitude and affection beyond describing, and in almost every part of the two big Angelinian cities near southern Galverinia, and in every village not ruined by the enemy outside of Angelinia Agathia big public receptions were indeed held in honor of their noble work. A beautiful close to the terrible years struggle around Angelinia Agathia they all had passed through was the Grand review in Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale of the two big armies under the Vivians, that had conquered, First Manley, then Adele-de-Garbe and captured two rebel armies and routed Beppo Evans and the fierce fighter Tamer Myletze. The troops were marched to the vicinity of the big capitol of Angelinia Agathia, and also moved through the city of Angelinia Agathia in the longest procession ever known at the music of a thousand bands, all reviewed by the two mightiest generals, and more people than any one could think of mentioning, by especially the little children who waved clouds of prettily colored Angelinian flags, and wore flag uniforms on the occasion.

Just before he took leave of Angelinia Agathia and the monstrous armies there to go north with his brother and aid in crushing the rebel invasion of Galverinia and northern Abyssinkile Robert Vivian himself issued on the last of October at a great holoween celebration the following inspiring address to them: "My brave and honorable soldiers of Jesu Jesus Christ and His Blessed Mother, and of the States of Abbieamnia; By your great and Patriotic devotion and devotion to your Holiest of countries on the face of the world in the terrible hour and years of danger and alarm, and your magnificent desperate and brave fighting, extreme bravery and endurance, you have maintained the existence of our great Angelinian Capitol

, and also maintained the supremacy of the Angelinian cause, and the Law of our Holy Pope who also was in danger at Glorinia, overthrown all armed seige and opposition to the enforcement of the Law of Angelinia Agathia, and hope will soon be able to overthrow Child Slavery and also abolished it which in the cause and main pretext of the great rebellion---and have with the saving of Angelinia Agathia opened the way to the rightful authorities, to restore order on every foot on Angelinia soil around our Capitol. Your marches against the besiegers, your sieges and great battles, near and distant, duration, and resolute resolution and brilliancy of all your results, dim the lustre of our past military achievements and will be our precedent in defense of Childrens liberty and rights in all time to come hereafter. In obedience to your countrys call when her city was in danger you brave men volunteered in aid to her defense. The most tremendous victory of the war has crowned your valor and secured the purpose of your brave Christian hearts, and with the gratefulness of your own countrymen, women and children, and of the whole old christian world in general and the highest honors a great and mighty old nation can accord, you will soon I hope with the final crushing of the rebellion be permitted to return to your homes and what have been left of your poor families, conscious of having been discharged as the highest and bravest christian soldiers the world or Heaven has ever known yet to achieve these very glorious triumphs, and secure to yourselves, your countrymen, and the blessings of God and the Nation, tens of millions of your gallant comrades have fallen, and sealed indeed the priceless legacy with their very blood. The great graves of these a most grateful nation bestows with a ocean of tears. It will forever honor their memory, and our governments will do all possible within our very power to cherish and support their stricken families, and to the orphans left by the war. *****

Although it attracted little attention or less attention than the besieged army the Angelinian National army helping in repelling the seige was of inestimable value during the war. and of seige in particular. It did excellent work in the blockade service and in co-operating with the besieged army in its actions along the rivers and in attack on forts in the hands of the besiegers, the Angelinian National warships captured or destroyed more than seven thousand rebel blockade runners on the rivers near and about Angelinia Agathia, which had been fitted out by the Glandolinian authorities, and furnished with every kind of supplies for the Glandolinian insurgents. The capture and destruction of so many of these Glandolinian vessels meant a dreadful loss to the Glandolinian government, taking the value of the ships and their cargoes into consideration of no close upon nine hundred million dollar dollars, but this was probably balanced, by the immense profits that were also made on the cargoes of the transport ships, that successfully ran the dangerous blockade, although this violation of the Angelinian law could hardly have been a safe thing, when the seige broke out the Angelinian extra navy then near Angelinia Agathia was composed of only seventy thousand men, but before the seige ended so disastrously for the enemy, that number had increased to one hundred thousand. During the seige, a large number had been taken from the blockading ships of Vivian Wickey Bay six hundred miles northward, and sent to repel the rebels at Angelinia Agathia until the number of ships were about ten thousand of which one thousand one hundred and thirteen were transports, and the rest of warships, monitors, and other iron clads. During the seige about 19,000,000 dollars worth of Angelinian shipping was destroyed by the desperate engagements on the river between the opposing fleets, and over a one hundred million dollar damage to rebel ships.

As far as possible possible during the horrors of the war itself, and of the horrors of the seige of Angelinia Agathia and the battles there the numberless sick and wounded were well cared for by the Angelinian Authorities, and by the conducting of the boy and girl scouts under Violet and her sisters and their girl and boy friends.

And through all the efforts of the Vivian Girl Princess the Angelinian generals and Angelinian Authorities were very liberal at once in supplying as many army hospitals as possible, and in furnishing them with every possible necessity, and in the employment of a large number of doctor and other physicians. When the war had extended up as far as the big seige of Angelinia Agathia, there were in the vicinity of Angelinia Agathia alone over five hundred and forty general army hospitals fully equipped, with a capacity of nearly five hundred thousand beds. Besides these everywhere through the war stricken regions of Angelinia, Calvernia, and Abseinkille there were many temporary and flying hospitals, erected in the many camps of advancing armies, and on all kinds of vessels and battleships battleships. In the report of General Hanson Angelic Vivian at the end of the great seige of Angelinia Agathia itself, it was shown that during the eleven most months of the seige there had been treated in the general hospitals in the big camps, and in hospitals and other buildings in God Dorothy Gale and Angelinia Agathia alone 101,876,543 cases of wounded, among whom the main average rate of mortality was only eight per cent or even less, which was smaller than had ever before been known in any big battle or seige of this sort.

One of the main chief causes for this immensely low rate of mortality in the Angelinian armies at Angelinia Agathia was the beneficent work done by two grand organizations, started by the orders of the Vivian Girl Princess themselves and the others by the Glia Angelinian Authorities.

The first named body however was founded by Violet and her sisters in person and was organized under the sanction of their father and Uncle. However the brave little founders were made presidents of the board of managers of the commission, and Gertrude Angelina was chosen general manager of their affairs. At the very outbreak of the tremendous war at once appealed to the people of the nation of Angelinia and her many big states for money and supplies to carry out its object, which was to help the wounded and sick soldiers with all kinds of delicacies, ice, stimulants, fruits and everything else, and with countless trained red cross nurses, and to do other work to relieve the terrible suffering on the horrible battlefields. The response was more liberal than was even expected. Money and supplies flowed in at once like a river torrent overflowing the banks, and even throughout the states women and children worked hard for it, made great sacrifices, and even contributed to it. Great fairs, and other entertainments were held in all large cities, and even towns and villages to aid it, and indeed they were well patronized, one fair in the big city of Sacremento Abbeanna taking in over eleven million dollars, while two held at Pandora Calvernia on the Mic-Hollester-Run netted in profit as much as an average as six dollars to each of the people. So generous and sudden was the response to the commissions appeal that when the big seige of Angelinia Agathia was broken and the enemy hurled away with the capture of three quarters of the besieging army and one of the best of generals it was found that the people had contributed to it, to the value of five billion dollars.

The commissions nobly lived up to the very high appreciation the people of the whole of Noble Angelinia showed for it. It being directed in person by the governments and high charitable organizations and founded by Violet and her sisters was untiring in its work of relieving the distress. Everywhere the smallest, or the most monstrous armies went it followed close and closely, and even at any risk was always ready to afford instant aid to those who needed it. With countless ambulances, army wagons, transports and other boats, which it employed especially for the purpose, the sick and wounded were carefully and tenderly transported as soon as possible possible to places far from the battlefields where they could be cared for, and trained Red Cross Nurses and thousands of brave nuns and other religious were always on hand. It also distributed a vast amount of food and provisions, hospital stores, delicacies and clothing, and uniforms, and at the same time looked after the moral and religious welfare of the countless legions of soldiers. Catholic bibles, and millions of other good reading books, newspapers, and all other articles of reading matter were all distributed free of charge among the millions of men in hospitals, camps, and ships, while Catholic chapels were erected at every camp whatever permanent or not. The money and supplies contributed by the people to this gallant commission amounted in value to nearly sixty trillion dollars in one year.

Through these two great Angelinian and Calverinian organizations, and the various other associations formed everywhere throughout the Angelinian states for the same purpose, and by private contributions, the loyal people of the Angelinian nation, spent many trillions of dollars. The employment into the Angelinian armies of rescued child slaves, as boy and girl signal corps scouts was for some time a much debated question, when a number of regiments of boy and girl scouts got together in one of the Angelinian armies in Pandora City (Calverinia) and began their marches and drills, and signals, in answer to Governor Hansons call for boy and girl scout troops, the many sympathizers with the glandelinian Confederate cause in Pandora became so wild and indignant, that they threatened the children with violence and massacre, and the many suppretending police were compelled at the orders of the city Mayor in order to preserve peace and quiet and to prevent bloody riots to order them to leave the city for the christian army immediately or cease drilling in the city.

During the second year of the fierce glandic-Angelinian war the action of general Andonia then in command of the department of the southern blockading squadrons and armies in ordering the organization of thousands of rescued child slaves into regiments of girl and boy scouts for the army, had aroused the indignation of glandelinian sympathizers; that were even then periling the Angelinian nation by being in their own governments in secret. One of them asked Robert Vivian in a message whether general Andonia had organized a number of regiments of fugitive child slaves both girls and boys, and whether the Angelinian government in Abbeaunia had allowed the act. When general Hanson demanded from Andonia for an answer to this he said in a return message to Hanson:

"No fugitive child slaves had been or is been or are being organized in boy and girl scouts in my own departments, but there may be and is however many fine regiments of boy and girls who are scouts now, whose rebel masters masters, are flying everywhere before the appearance of the Angelinian flag and our armies, leaving thousands many scores of thousands of children slaves behind them, to shift for themselves as best as they can."

The terrible prejudice against the making of boy and girl scouts out of fugitive child slaves did not abate a particle but nevertheless the Angelinian Authorities had organized up to the time of the siege of Angelinia Agathia about ne nearly one million, two hundred thousand child troops of girl and boy scouts in the various armies, fighting for their freedom, in the manner of signalling to the generals from stations, serving the wounded, aiding others and even fighting the very enemy and as the soldiers did.

A host history story of the big glandic-Angelinian war and its effects with all its sieges battles, and the like, would surely I'm thinking would not would not be complete without some mention of the strange and yet cruel arrangements for the abrupt of exchange of prisoners between both sides, and of the treatment of Angelinian and other prisoners confined in many of the worse Glandelinian prisons. It happened however a on account of the wickedness and ferocity of most of the glandelinians that it was a very long time before any kind of plans for an exchange of prisoners was adopted, because the National governments of Angelinia, considering the glandelinians as not only the wickedness of rebels ever existing, but also accusing them of an abrupt or attempted rebellion against all Christianity and probably of God himself would not at first consent to enter into any negotiations with them as equals or common human beings, which it would have too to arrange any plan for the exchange of prisoners prisoners.

As the glandelinian Authorities were considered terribly guilty of the massacres of so many children, non-combatants and the wanton destruction of property throughout all of Calverinia and northern Angelinia, the Angelinian governments felt therefore that the glandelinians even had no right whatever to dare to take hold of prisoners or even hold them, and to treat with them would be an admission that they had which would be worse than acknowledging them as the worse of all belligerents or enemies of Our Blessed Lord. Still despite the horrors the fierce Mic-Hollesinian and Zimmermanian glandelinians did in the massacres of children and the horrible other crimes too innumerable to even fill a world of books the Angelinian governments not knowing which of the rebels were guilty could not treat the prisoners it took as rebels and hang them, or shoot shoot them as murderers, for the enemy having shown their terrible ferocity already to even the prettiest of children as the vivian girls would at once retaliate in a manner to commit a crime to mention here, and the war would thus become something else which would make all of Heaven blush for me to dare mention. The first glandelinians captured by the Angelinian Federals were murderers held guilty of the massacres of children at Crowley Jennie Wren, own and Calmanrinia and also other places, and though not put to death as supposed they were condemned as vandal felons or as murderers and pirates combined and placed in felons cells. Immediately the glandelinians confined in like manner the highest of Angelinian officers captured at various battles, and reserved them for the same and worse fate according that would be meted out to the imprisoned soldiers guilty of the massacres of thousands of children.

When the prisoners taken on both sides, soon numbered among the hundreds of millions, and something had to be done at whatever the cost, at length the Angelinian Federal Authorities, after trying many serious devices to escape it, were compelled to open negotiations with the glandelinian government, and after some hot debates a plan finally was arranged for the exchange of prisoners.

It is probably very interesting to note the scale of equivalents that was agreed upon in this very plan. When there happened to be no officer of equal rank to be exchanged between both sides for a captive officer it was arranged that six hundred privates, or seamen or others were to be given for a general in chief, or even for admirals, sixty for a flag officer or major general, forty six for a commodore, carrying a broad pennant, or a brigadier general, forty for a captain of the navy or a colonel, ten for a lieutenant colonel or any high commander in the navy, eight for a lieutenant commander of some major please, sixteen for a lieutenant or a master master hand in the navy or a captain in the army of marines, four for master mates in the navy, three for midship men and warrant officers in the navy masters of merchant and transport ships and commanders of privateers, two for second captains, lieutenants or mates of merchant vessel or privateers and all petty officers in the navy, and all non-commissioned officers in the army or marines. Privates and common seamen, were exchanged for each other please please for man to man. This plan indeed had been in operation but a very short time however, when King Glandlin by his fierce anger of the empty employment of Children boy and girl scout troops in the christian armies and having interrupted it completely in the month of December 1973.

On the twelfth of that beautiful month he issued a proclamation ordering the delivery of all the Angelinian officers of the Abbeaunian Federal army, commanding boy and girl scout soldiers that might be captured at or that date to the respective glandelinian state authorities, to be hanged, shot or quartered, and directing that all child scouts who are captured to be treated as common soldiers of the so called "christian dogs" and to share the same fate as other children if captured. The glandelinian King and his Authorities and other governments and high tribunals then instructed the glandelinian Confederate Commission of Exchange to refuse to consider any captive children scout scouts of the Angelinians as prisoners of war and to destroy them every time they are captured. When in January 1974 the Angelinian Commissioner commanded and demanded the revoking of these wicked and defiant instructions, the glandelinian Commission of the glandelinian Confederacy wrote:

"We are ordered to do so by the government - Governmental Authorities of our King, and therefore we and the whole nation will die or be driven to perdition in the last ditch before giving up the right to send Child slaves stolen from other christian nations back into slavery."

Reorganizing the just claim of Child slave defenders of the Angelinian flag to an equal right of exchange with other Angelinian prisoners, the Angelinian national governments then caused a complete stopping of the exchange of prisoners until the child scout captives taken prisoners by the rebels should be treated simply as prisoners of war, or even released under any conditions.

Indeed the result of this action was a larger increase in the number and horrible sufferings of the millions of Angelinian prisoners in all the glandelinian prisons in the glandelinian country and also in the captured Calverinian cities and towns and elsewhere. Indeed stories of cruelty toward these prisoners and also to the many child captives soon became current beyond estimating, and before long in deed it seemed as if it was the purpose of the wicked Glandelinian King to obstruct exchanges in so a manner of prisoners by long and most acute suffering and torture as to render them unfit for further services against him and his various glandelinian armies. No one investigated these stories, published by newspapers, told by war correspondents and so on, a good number of committees were appointed by the Angelinian sanitary Commissions, with spies and gendarmes members to boot.

After several weeks secret investigation at the risk of capture or of being shot the committee members finally rendered reports in which one of them said: "It is the same horrible story ever, where of true prisoners of war, and even child captives and child slaves treated worse than the worse of convicts, shut up either in so suffocating buildings or in outdoor enclosures without even any kind of shelter which is provided for the worse beasts of the field, unsupplied with sufficient food, applied with food and water injurious and even poisonous and deadly, compelled to even live on floors always covered with all kinds of human filth or on ground and ash saturated with it, compelled to breathe an air oppressed with a most intolerable stench, hemmed in by a fatal dead line, and in minute danger of being shot down like dogs by unrestrained and most brutal glandelinian guards consisting of Curses and Scoundrels and Gargoyles, despondent even to madness, idiotic and even suicide, sick of disease and fevers (so congruous in character and so on as to spread like the worse plague,) caused by the torrid sun, by decaying food, by all kinds of filth, by fierce vermin, by fevers of all sorts, colds, removed at the last moment and by thousands and even scores of thousands at a time to hospitals more corrupt than asphyxiated, there with no reminders of any sort, no care and no sympathy, to die a in horror and wretchedness, not only among strangers, but among enemies too resentful to either have the slightest pity or to show any mercy.

These are entirely positive facts beyond the slightest doubt. Tens of millions of helplessness and even child captives who had been boy and girl scouts have been and are even now still being, disabled and destroyed, by a terrible process as sure and ascertain as slow poison, and as cruel or more cruel than the burning out the stake, because nearly as agonizing, and more prolonged. These horrible scenes are daily being and allowed by the government of glandelinia in glandelinia and Calverinia."

The man in charge of one of the terrible glandelinian internment camps and all the prison camps and houses at Vivian Wickkey held by the glandelinian armies there for some time and who was responsible for the worse reign of terror ever heard or written of, and for the horrible massacres at Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo sections, was Brigadier General James Purragatorian, who was among the generals who outside of that point later in the war at attacked with his new armies the christian forces opposed to him more fierce than any rebel general ever did and who always won a battle, his reputation for the treatment of prisoners and for the massacres he committed inside of Vivian Wickkey, and during his advances against the Angelinians later in the war in raiding towns and villages was so great and terrible, that when wounded at the battle of Marc on Marcocino or Wadenagodonack he was transferred to a big glandelinian prison at the Boy King Islands for his recovery and to take charge there at the same time, the very more human glandelinians exclaimed among themselves: "Thank God the Calverinia section of glandelinia has been at last rid of old Purragatorian. But God indeed have mercy upon those now whom he has been sent in these Islands."

Some of the human glandelinians themselves even furnished testimony corroborative of statements made by many prisoners. In a report made in July 1914 by one of the members of the Chairman of the glandelinian House of Representatives upon the various men women and children prisoners at Vivian Wickkey and Mic-Whirt or Jaont in which millions of little children were even confined like maddogs it was declared that the state of things was more terrible than realized or made up by war correspondents and reporters, terrible beyond description, about as bad as the suffering of the lost souls themselves. But the very glandelinian committee themselves could not stay in any of the prisons or prison internment camps over a few seconds not say minutes and that the committee were not allowed to make any reports on the conditions for fear it would be printed and cause a world war against glandelinia. When a committee of the Angelinian Christian Catholic Commission appeared before the lines of general Hanley's main armies, and asked permission to be allowed to visit the Angelinian prisoners and child prisoners at Vivian Wickkey and the Blengiglomense and Boy King Islands and elsewhere throughout the war stricken regions for the purpose of affording them relief, with the understanding that similar committees of the rebels on like missions would be granted the same favors in Angelinian prisoners prisons, it was harshly refused even by general Leonia Meldonia Dicknell and Adela-De-Garbe and other generals, as many war correspondents and others testified, as the glandelinian glandelinian tribunals and authorities at Vivian Wickkey and elsewhere did not dare face an exposure of their wicked methods.

So during the cessation of the exchange of prisoners nearly four hundred million four hundred and forty thousand Angelinian soldiers and two million children children scouts went through the torture and starving process, and were reduced to mere skeletons, so that they hardly had strength to walk. Having got them to this pass the glandelinian authorities made a proposition for the redemption of final exchanges. At first it was refused by general Hanson Vivian and his brother, but for the sake of humanity, he and the Angelinian national governments finally agreed to it, and the poor fellows and children confined in glandelinian prisoners were finally liberated. It could hardly be called a fair exchange that took place then, for the rebel soldiers confined in all parts of the Angelinian countries were well fed, and otherwise comfortably provided for. This was recognized by the glandelinian Confederate Commissioner of exchange-- who in a letter to general Purragatorian from Calverine when exchanged had been rescued said:

"The arrangements toward the glandelinian governments have made concerning prisoners works largely in our favor and we will win the rebellion. We also get rid of millions of old miserable wretches, men and children, girls and boys, once pretty and handsome and now all disfigured while we received the best men we ever saw."

If his own plain statements are to be believed by the Angelinian governments and the generals and the population it may have been probable that the great general Johnston Jackson Hanley of the glandelinian Confederate Authorities may not have been one who knew of a real existence of a plan to starve the Angelinian prisoners of war and wipe out the inhabitants of Calverinia who sided with the nationals. He testified before the Committee of Reconstruction, that he knew nothing of all the alleged cruelties about which complaints had been made, that no reports about the horrible massacres, the big fires, wanton destruction of property and the giant and gigantic massacres of children had ever been submitted to him, and that he did not even know at the time who was in command at Calverine, Calverine, Vivian Wickkey, Mic-Whirt or Jaont and other places where christian soldiers and help less women and children were confined. But indeed who ever knew of the awful butcheries and the awful cruelties to Angelinian soldiers, priests women and child children and the religious persons, or who ever was responsible for them it was only very just to say that the great body of glandelinian people were entirely ignorant of them, and in no way responsible for their existence. Had they known of the terrible suffering that was going on in their prisons in Galverinia and glandelinia and of the horrible massacres that startled the world with the news about them they would have been just as indignant as were the people of the Angolinian countries out of the christian world, and if they had the power to do so would have corrected the abuses at once by force. The great majority of the glandi glandelinian people in the glandelinian states, north or south were as they are now, kind hearted in parts, loving, humane, hospitable and would never for a moment have tolerated such a state of things in their part of the country if they had known about it, and could have helped it. They were purposely kept in ignorance by the seeming king, the wicked glandelinian generals and glandelinian politicians who were responsible for it, and who by their selfish and wicked methods by keeping child slavery in existence in Galverinia brought the war upon the vast country. Had the people in southern glandelinia been allowed to have a voice in the councils of the seceding glandelinian states it was not unlikely that there would never have been a big Angolinian civil war with its terrible superhuman preternatural loss of life and such immense destruction of property and wide world suffering and sorrow. They would surely have without the slightest doubts found some other means more human than war for settling the differences that arose between the two sections of the vast Angolinian Nation.

In the meantime general Germaine Vivian had pursued the armies of rebels under general Beppo Evans. The pursuit lasted nearly a week and seeing himself being hard pressed general Beppo Evans halted his armies near the town of Eva St glars.

AS

SERIES OF EVENTS.

AS the christian armies who followed after general Beppo Evans drove him from Evangeline St glars and entered the noble city itself hundreds of thousands of patriotic Angolinian and Abbasannian citizens, women men and children flocked filled every available place and pace in the big streets, in the railroad stations, and so on when they saw christian force under general Robert Vivian entered on its way to pursue general Beppo Evans after marching through the woodland toward the town. The people, men women and children cheered the soldiers enthusiastically and wished them the safest journey and hoped them victory over the big glandelinian army they were pursuing please. The christian army was composed of 10,000,789 men. This was the division of troops mostly Abbasannian which upon its arrival to defend the Angelinian Capitol was the first to have been in action against the advanced guard of the rebel besiegers, who attempted to stop its progress of success toward Germaine Vivian. Indeed general Robert Vivian's army received a gallant reception. From the very moment it became known in the whole city of Evangeline St glars that the army of Angelinia under the very king himself, the Gallant royal army was the first christian army of the war that had ever happened to enter the city in pursuit of a vast rebel army the excitement among the people, men women and children was intense. At the same moment the christian soldiers were passing through the streets there was the most extraordinary excitement and joy in the whole city. Windows along the whole line of march were taken possession of, and flags were seen in bright colors by the millions and even groups of people men women and children accumulated on the stoops and tops of houses and jammed the streets all cheering loudly and flapping flags. Deafening cheers that were fairly ear-splitting greeted the victorious soldiers of Angelinia. Agathia defense everywhere, and during a slight halt children hugged every soldier, and priests and old men rushed in front of general Robert Vivian and his staff and cried out: "God bless you boys of Angelinia. Go your duty. Fight for your flag and god and his blessed Mother. Our Cause is Holy and just and will win." "Hallelujah!"

The advance guard of the Angelinian army after leaving A Evangeline St glars came upon the town of Jessica about ten miles from St glars and on the following morning there was a smart skirmish between a force of Angelinian dragoons under general Thomas Perkins and a body of eleven thousand five hundred glandelinian infantry the rear guard of Beppo Evans army. The Angelinian cavalry charged fiercely into the town, meeting with a most brisk fire from all the houses on both sides of the street and from all quarters of the town. The Angelinian general lost his horse which was shot under him and he was slightly wounded. The glandelinians however being the greater number and as Beppo Evans had been aroused and was sending troops to the aid the glandelinians began to dislodge the Angelinians and the Angelinians cavalry fought their way out taking with them seven thousand prisoners. An hour after this the main christian army had arrived to the scene and found the glandelinians in great force gathered under general Ignor Myette and posted behind a long line of batteries of the heaviest guns. And the first sign they had of the rally of the enemy was a heavy fire that at one volley mowed down a whole regiment. After bravely standing their ground, and succeeding with their own artillery fire in slackening that of the enemy, they were ordered to retreat by general Germaine Vivian as Beppo Evans was massing his main force to attack. In the action a number of gallant officers on the christian side were killed among them Colonel Ander and general James Winkle.

Having no support as yet from the main christian force these Angelinian troops retreated in splendid order the cause of their defeat being explained as the incompetency of one of the generals. At the same time general Walter Stanck and four brigades of Abbsannians were approaching the vicinity of Jassica when on turning a bend in the road near by they were fired upon by masked batteries of thirty guns with shells, round shot and grape, killing and wounding half of their number in one discharge before the column therefore could not stop. Being thus ambushed by rebel artillery the Angelinian brigades retired hastily through the woods to warn the main army that Beppo Evans was preparing to make a stand. They retreated slowly bearing off ten thousand wounded about five miles away, where they made a stand awaiting the advance of the main army.

Now or upon the arrival of the first main division of Robert Vivians army they moved against the enemy and immediately a heavier fire was opened upon them, the glandelinians firing shot shell and grape, mingled with canister, but indeed so wildly that little damage was done. The christian forces hesitated to drop flat and displayed as large lines of skirmishers advanced slowly, and the glandelinians mistaking this movement rushed from their works and charged upon the Angelinians. The whole christian line was thus engaged then opened a most terrific and destructive volley and then rushed into the enemys ranks with fixed bayonets. The fight now raged very promiscuously over the whole region for six miles, the glandelinians soon being driven back to their own positions, and from here the battle continued for over half an hour and a tremendous charge was made by the Angelinians but it resulted in a dreadful loss of sixty thousand four hundred and eighty one killed, and nearly four hundred thousand wounded, and a dreadful repulse of the Angelinian forces. The glandelinians suffered less losses but though repulsing the Angelinians they did not receive as yet the main division of their force and were in no condition to pursue the advantage they had gained, and had they done so they might have converted the repulse into a disastrous and total defeat for the whole christian army. It had been a bloody fray for that dreadful hour in which though defeated the Abbsannians who made the attack on the enemys works especially distinguished itself. Under the leadership of general Lebanon the men made a most gallant charge upon superior numbers of the insurgents, and although wounded in the head and leg twice, and two horses killed under him, the christian general quickly mounted another and dashed to the front of the division in the face of that fearful storm. He was killed instantly.

After this repulse there was a ten minutes lull in the conflict and then from a hilly wooded region in the neighbourhood of Jassica to large wings or wedges of glandelinians were seen marched toward the right of the quickly forming main christian line. This immense body of glandelinians advanced under cover of the woods, when the Angelinian force ordered forward rushed upon the enemy. The glandelinian cavalry then suddenly appeared, and the attack was repulsed, but at that moment the Angelinian artillery opened and hurled a volley of shells into the midst of the glandelinian cavalry, almost annihilating it, the survivors at once retiring in confusion. The Angelinian artillery then sent broadside after broadside of shells and grape into the rebels in the cover of the woods, which did so much execution among the glandelinians that the officers could not rally them then until the arrival of reinforcements hastily sent by Beppo Evans.

The enemy in the woods did not make an attempt to charge however as was expected but started a heavy firing, and in order to quench that fire the Abbsannian troops under general Great Heart moved forward and pushed on into the wooded country on the left of the enemy, while the other columns kept up the fight in front. As soon as the flanking party reached the rear of the wooded territory they retreated and were pursued for about a mile. The glandelinian generals here had made repeated efforts to rally the troops but it was fruitless, for in a short time the glandelinians at this point seemed to have broken into the wildest disorder, the forces under general Snaker apparently alone making an effort to withstand the christian tide. But after some hard fighting it was finally compelled to yield to the masses against it. The glandelinians in the woods then on all sides at least retreated in confusion toward the direction of Beppo Evans main army at Jassica. By eight o'clock in the morning the last of the fugitives had reached Jassica. At another point of this battle line general Germaine Vivian had led a portion of his cavalry against the glandelinian position under general Panna De Terro whose force was nearly two million strong, while he had but one hundred and fifty thousand men. However notwithstanding this he and his small cavalry force made a gallant charge into the enemys works and across in the face of a withering tempest of bullets, grape and canister. After a desperate fight he succeeded in forcing the glandelinians to break away in the wildest disorder, thus making the first charge of his bodyguard of troopers a great success. After the first charge of the troopers readily under General Vivian Germaine giving himself came up with fifty thousand more men. He ordered to follow the retreating glandelinians was immediately given, and all dashed ahead for a second charge through the small woods. The rebels here fought fiercely and with reckless desperation and the Angelinian cavalry was repulsed and driven back to the main line many of the Angelinian fugitives being overtaken there as well as in the forest beyond the battle line. General Germaine Vivian's brave followers suffered a loss of eighty four thousand in killed and wounded in this engagement which, for the very boldness of its undertaking, and the rapidity of its execution under the great disparity of numbers certainly had but few parallels in the glandic-Angelinian war.

There was no further action during the day but at night time the Angelinian forces made a night surprise attack, and indeed dear readers sneaking upon an enemy at night this is a very good policy if you succeed in catching him by while he sleeps but if he should wake up in time as is usually the case here, he is generally in the maddest and most ferocious humor than can be believed, and doubly dangerous. General Germaine Vivian who led the night surprise attack found this to be the fact. The glandelinians pitched into the massive christian columns like the wildest savages, slashing right and left, fighting fearful bayonet duels, and pouring blazing volleys of pistol and musketry into the crowded Angelinian force which fairly blocked up the captured works, and filled the woods in the rear of the enemys position in a thick confused mass. Their superior numbers however were only a bad impediment or worse, and when the glandelinians were reinforced and poured against them like a yelling torrent, and another column broke loose upon them in the rear, and a glandelinian cavalry came clattering down upon them with a wild war-whoop the Angelinians had to retire and seek safety in a wild flight. General Glandon who reinforced glandelinian columns were comparatively fresh made a counter charge upon the disordered Angelinians. Ten brigades formed the assailing column. Across the field in front of the woods the Angelinians were driven until they reached a small ridge where they made a stand. Up this ridge the enemy rushed. Before them however lay an ascent of five hundred yards, and a furious firing followed between them and the Angelinian column which lighted up the scene like an inferno. When less than fifty yards had been gained the onrushing glandelinian columns received a tremendous fire from the hill top which tore the glandelinian column. The rebel leaders ordered their men to lie down, and when the heavy firing seemed exhausted and the flashes stopped until everything was dark again, they arose and pushed up the hill at last reaching the top.

Here they were suddenly met by a blaze of fire that withered their whole front line but the survivors pushed on and drove the Angelinians from the works. The fight and pursuit that night lasted for nearly three hours and a half, and by morning the Angelinian forces under Germaine Vivian had entirely disappeared from that region and were back in the main line. When the Angelinians had been driven from their breastworks on the hill they had attempted to run off ten tons of their cannon. A brigade of glandelinians started in pursuit. The glandelinians on turning the wooded left found the Angelinians drawn up across in front, firing from a small school building and from behind trees and bushes on the hill top. The Angelinians however set fire to the house by fire grenades, and charged with fixed bayonets, driving the Angelinians from their position, taking several thousand prisoners, and capturing the cannon with 1 out losing a man.

During the following morning there was fierce activity, and while the christian waves of attack were surging fiercely against the defending glandelinian breakers the opposed lines of battle all morning were so often carried all alone to each other that large portions of each other were mixed up with the other in hand to hand death struggles. Owing to the consequent confusion and the thickness of the smoke caused by the wild firing of both sides, the commanding generals of both sides at times unknowingly came in dangerous vicinity of foes. At one time two mounted generals came trotting along the right flank of an Abbeismian Brigade hidden by the wall of smoke of cannon and musketry and noticing their firing upon a wall of glandelinians near by, shouted to them immediately, "Don't fire on your friends. They are Scoodler Mic-Hollistinians." General Germaine Vivian at this juncture came up at the front of one of his brigades to note the fierce firing of both sides, and in a glance recognized one of the rebel officers as general Izner Myletze. In a twinkling he had pulled out his revolver, and fired at the glandelinian chief with the intention of putting a bullet through his breast, but the rebel general was quickest, and Germaine Vivian was shot and severely wounded. The general said put spurs to his horse and quickly spread the news among the Abbeismians of the wounded of their generals. After gallantly enduring the most galling fire of the invincible glandelinian army, although now leaderless, for about four or five hours, in the event of which the attacking glandelinian forces under Izner Myletze was getting nearer and nearer to the devoted fortified works, general Daytonia who succeeded Germaine Vivian seeing his self and his army overlapped and in danger of being struck in the flank gave orders for the retirement of the division. The retreat being under the heaviest fire of canister, shell and grape, soon ripened into a flight, and a flight which even eclipsed that even at Candandon. The chivalry of the Angelinians, which is supposed to be born insensible of any fear whatever in flying from the a captured works, threw everything away. The exact path of the flight of the immense division was encumbered, with account accoutrements, arms of every description, knapsacks--in a word everything that could facilitate a flying soldiers speed had been thrown away as worthless.

Seeing the disaster to the christian forces of Germaine Vivians and hearing of the general being wounded Greatheart put his command in line of battle to arrest the disorder of the retreating troops and finally did so before the victorious enemy finally came up. When he ordered his line of men to reserve their fire until the enemy had reached to within a few hundred yards near the middle of the fields when they opened a most destructive fire upon the whole advancing gray line, with grape, canister and musketry, which forced the survivors to retreat precipitately, after losing between two and three hundred thousand in killed and wounded, which they left for miles strewn like grain on the battlefield. The glandelinians here then closed their ranks and retired in the same order they had advanced. The flight in this section was the most bitter and severely contested of the morning, during the terrible rout of Germaine Vivians division the most terrible scene was the retreat of general Gorman J. Clashes battery. This general was wounded early in the morning's action, and carried from the bloody battle field, but his artillery men fought like dragons. Horses and men dropped on all sides everywhere by hundreds under the galling fire of the advancing victorious enemy who nearly surrounded them. The eleventh Abbeismian Brigade of Abyssinkilian Munchkins and Winkies, and also "Hudlings", which supported the battery fought desperately like tigers, but overwhelming masses of the enemy pressed close and closer, and they finally had to fall back to the right and left leaving the unfortunate general Gorman J. Clashes unsupported. The terrible character of this fight will be better understood by the reader from the fact that the engagement lasted only seventy minutes and that during this time general Gorman J. Clashes battery lost forty hundred horses, and thirty thousand men in killed and wounded. You can guess then from the number of men at each gun how many cannon there had been. And yet these failed to check the Zimmarmanian onslaught.

Therefore the flight of these troops left the christian battery big as it was completely unprotected the battery being planted on a hill, to the left of Jessica but the Concentinian and Abbeismian divisions soon came to its aid, and supported it until general Clashes was killed and six colonels and other officers shot down when the division fell back in order. The glandelinians now charged furiously and took the battery, thus flanking general Gormanias line, whose divisions after first falling back in order broke into a rout. Here the sudden death of general Mic-Garr who was getting his own battery in position on the left wing of Izner Vivians line created a panic here also, and many of the guns broke and ran. For a time not being supported by any division general Gormanias army had been forced back to the right of his own position where it was rallied by General Greatheart's division and where it again formed and shared the fortunes of the day. But the attack of the enemy being resumed with redoubled violence was pressed. General Greatheart after maintaining his first position for a considerable time found soon that the enemy was turning his right and left flanks, which were left unprotected, and so he slowly fell back, but in admirable order, until he reached a large series of fields occupied by a portion of general Jimmie Vivians big army, while a strong battery of artillery and supporting divisions guarded his rear. He therefore disposed his forces of troops at right angles forming in a long solid battle line along the edge of the portion of the Mic-Hollister Woods in that location, fronting a crossroad, and toward the right, where the enemy were endeavoring to find an opening. The battle here was fought with the most extraordinary perseverance and finally successful. The first charge of the glandelinians upon this line was made upon Greatheart's and Jimmie Vivian's works toward noon. The surroundings of this intrenchment were covered with abatis of the worse character for the charging glandelinian troops under Izner Myletze. In front of the long line of intrenchment was a quantity of broken down timber and the ground was full of underbrush and oak scrub placed there for an abatis. To one the enemy had indeed a very spectral look. Beyond this was a very steep high line of earthworks and in front was defended by a long line of artillery and rifle pits. About eleven o'clock in the forenoon, general Izner Myletze having gained courage from his defeating Germaine Vivians army, gave the order to charge against Greatheart and Jimmie Vivians newly formed position, and at the word the glandelinians rushed headlong on the christian positions, but the nature of the breastworks, the formation of the abatis, and the deadly fire of artillery and musketry was too much for them, and after a gallant and desperate conflict, in which many of the glandelinians fell without seeing their foe on account of the wall of smoke along the christian line, general Izner Myletze who had led them like a hero, ordered the survivors to retire. This was done in good order after losing four hundred thousand in killed and wounded.

General Jimmie Vivians sudden counter charge decided it for Izner Myletze for it left the real key of the rebel position in Angelinian hands. With the reinforcements which general Robert Vivian had caused to be immediately sent to him and his son immediately upon reaching the scene, general Jimmie Vivian retaken all the ground Germaine Vivian had lost, though it proved to be a dead dearly bought advantage for the christians. They had in fact repulsed the charge of Izner Myletze and recovered the lost ground after sustaining a loss of 2,228,999 in killed and wounded, while the glandelinians lost only half that number. General Henry Greatheart of the Abyssinkilian division of Winkies and Munchkins, had during the war and during many battles shared in the dangers of many an daring adventure. On the last hour of the morning of the action at Jessica, and while the glandelinians after being repulsed were flying in the utmost confusion from the assault they had given up, three of the glandelinian generals in their flight passed very near the place where general Greatheart was stationed. The general all alone and without an escort immediately started in pursuit. Coming within pistol range, he fired at the nearest of his flying glandelinian foes. This brought the glandelinian general who happened to be general Frank Actuelle suddenly down on his horses back. General Henry Greatheart believed this however to be a flint or a trick of the rebel general to avoid a second shot and so he determined to drag him from his saddle by main force. Gliding up to his side for this very pure purpose after a swift ride he seized him suddenly by the hair of his head but to the christian generals sudden disgust he only brought off the glandelinian general's big gray wig. Instantly recovering his headquadrant however, he again started for the insurgent but his pistol had done its work however, and before Greatheart reached him, his lifeless body had fallen from the saddle. Despite the fact that his big assault was routed so disastrously general Izner Myletae regathered his broken divisions and receiving reinforcements from Joseph Jarger and from Augustus Darger resumed the assault an hour after and the glandelinians in three long lines made a most brilliant and overwhelming charge on the three mile long christian redoubts and after meeting dreadful losses, and having one of their lines destroyed finally took a portion of the works at the point of the bayonet. The works at the point it was captured was defended by three brigades of Abyssinkilian "badlings who fought with such valor which to use a phrase probably never heard before" was worth a better cause. The glandelinian assailants were exposed to a most galling fire of cannon and musketry from the instant they left the shelter of their wooded positions, until they reached the brink of the deep ditches fronting the works. The rebels in pushing on during the assault had to go through a thick forested region over a wild and broken country, obstructed by bushes, laurels, fallen timber, and rocks from which the Angelinians who had retreated had poured a fierce fire on rallying. Fore the driving assault of the enemy was checked, and troops that had been hurled to the scene soon routed the rebels a second time. At the same time a desperate cavalry conflict raged elsewhere along the battle line. The sixth sixteenth Regular Continentian, cavalry of eighty thousand men while moving forward to protect the rear of Jimmie Vivians line of battle came suddenly in front of a large force of Gargoylian cavalry. The Angelinians immediately charged and closed with them. After a desperate conflict they cut through the rebel line of cavalry, and caused the utmost confusion to prevail, after which they returned to their duty as ordered the enemy having been obliged to retreat precipitately.

However by one of those most singular chances which have always made the most conventional days of rest the very days of battle in horror the counter advance of general Jimmie Vivians army came up on the afternoon with the retreated glandelinian forces under Izner Myletae right at Jessica. The enemy who had retreated had posted it himself among their own wooded positions, and their positions were much strengthed by the very uneven surfaces of the ground and by hills beyond also. Before the advancing christian forces under Jimmie Vivian was spread a wide amphitheatre, not usually of level ground, but of rolling hills skirted by beautiful forests, which completely shielded the wicked glandelinian enemy.

General Jimmie Vivian who with his three divisions had the left wing of general Robert Vivians main army, advanced fiercely driving the enemys outposts and other columns through thick belt of the timber in the face of dogged resistance, and over open fields of all sorts and into a another section of the thick wooded region.

It was while crossing the open fields in pursuit that one of his brigades suffered horrible loss. The enemy hidden behind strong positions in the wheat, and corn and other crops on the edge of fields, behind fences, and in the woods, suddenly revealed themselves by a most terrible withering fire that cut down nearly the whole of the brigade and other large forces in advance. In accordance with the usual tactics the rebels still keeping up their heavy fire gave way, and Jimmie Vivian drove them back at the point of the bayonet, until he found two others of his brigades with a battery nearly surrounded by the Zimmermannians. They pressed around the guns like yelling demons but the pest pelting blizzard storm of grape and canister, with the rifle storm of the brave Abyssinkilians who were detailed detailed to the support of the endangered batteries managed to hold them at bay. General Jimmie Vivians who command then shattered as it was was forced to fall back, at first in some great confusion, but finally in good order, and took position on the open ground, expecting the enemy to follow immediately, but for a time not supported as yet by the main army of Beppo Vivians they preferred the woods and made no pursuit though their artillery kept up a dreadful thundering hammering.

About twenty minutes later however the glandelinians suddenly came rushing forward again, and kept on increasing, until they approached like a big river torrent. The right wing of general Vivians division stopped this driving advance of the glandelinians by a most determined defense along a little creek bank leading through their own selected position on the right of the field. The firing was so heavy and fierce that it looked as if the fields and woods had taken fire the smoke of cannon and musketry filling the region of the fields and woods with dense volumes of smoke and the Angelinians were only able to discover the position of the foe by the sound of the unceasing rattle of musketry and the ear-splitting crash of cannon and the whizzing of bullets. In this tremendous resumption of the fierce conflict the Jim-Hollensteinian divisions led the charge and so fiercely was Jimmie Vivian and Great Heart pressed that general Robert

Vivian had to send him aid. The sight of the conflict was sublime and terrific. The rebel columns were torn and shattered but on the survivors sped with terrific yell, headless of the hurricanes of bullets grape and canister of the christian line. However the christian position was so steep and the timber so cleared that the Angelinians left a gap in their strong lines of rifle pits and works and through this gap the glandelinians were bound to go. Night up they went, climbing on all fours, their line of dark gray clothing advancing regularly forward through that pall of smoke and sheet of flame. They reached the christian works. The numbers too terrible to relate fell. The surprise and horror of it was breathless and the crash of battle shook the earth and made the leaves of the trees tremble as if there was a windstorm a windstorm. Yet, see the rebels line a tidal wave rush over the works--they fall and melt away in brigades,--as they are lost. God Good Heavens what a slaughter. Another monstrous mass, and still another, and another close up the massive gaps. All is covered in smoke and the roar of firing and yelling, and groans of wounded and dying is louder. The lodgement is finally made, and the glandelinian troops began to swarm forward, their bright bayonets glittering in the afternoon sunlight. For some reason or other the firing slackens.

Close behind the big brigade general Turners batt battery of rifled and Krupp and centimeter guns was tugging away from the forced christian positions amid the uproar of ye lls and hand to hand conflicts, the horses plunging the driven drivers whipping. Onward through that seething inferno the glandelinians go, where no human being ever went before. No sooner in possession of the works, then the guns by a desperate charge are captured, the men were at their posts. Percussion shells, gang-gang shells and high explosives mingled with grape and canister were shot spitefully from the captured guns at the flying Angelinians. It seemed the day was at last gained, and from the rebels cheers and cheers rent the air, and in a few minutes all was a hush. General Robert Vivian had reinforced Jimmie Vivian and Greatheart and their forces had rallied and were coming to regain the position.

The glandelinian batteries reopened fire and it indeed deserved credit for its firing was admirable, and several times did the skilful Zimmermannian and goodlier cannoneers check the advance of the rallied Angelinians. The skill with which the glandelinian battery was handled and the position it had was very conspicuous, but it did not check the advance of the rallied and reinforced Angelinians for good, for the advance was immediately ordered and in spite of the artillery it again moved forward in perfect silence until it came to the open field. As soon as the monstrous christian surge was clear of the woods, with a yell and cheer that could have been heard all over the desperate battlefield, it took the double quick, and though at every step its thousands upon thousands of ranks grew thinner and thinner from the murderous fire through which it passed, yet there was no faltering on the part of the survivors, no hesitancy, onward across the fields, up the slopes and into and through the woods it went, until it met the rebel line in possession of the christian works. Forced at last to yield to overwhelming odds, it retired over the ground gained at such a frightful cost until it reached the cover from which it started. Here what remained of the divisions held their position, until the other divisions could come close to its support. When exhausted, cut to pieces, its officers and under generals all gone, Jimmie Vivian wounded, and Henry Great Heart killed, with no one to direct them those who survived of the christian divisions gathered as fast as they could,

General Jackson riding and directed many of his biggest batteries at the floating batteries of the Angolinian besiegers, but while the terrific shells struck even one christian floating battery of eighteen guns over fifty times amid horrible explosions not the slightest impression was made upon its iron clad sides. While these floating batteries were occasionally firing upon the Mic-Ho-letstlinian fortifications from the sea board, a portion of the besieging christian fleets of warships were making a fierce attack upon the landelinian batteries at the entrance to the gunbeam Crook river and after a two two days dreadful fight succeeded in silencing some of the batteries at the Liaghburg Landing, but for want of more long range ammunition could not with any effect respond to the heaviest storming fire from the Evangelinia grand Evangelinia granda heights and Turners Hill and fortress Thumba'ina, and so with ten ships fully damaged he had to withdraw. The following day however with additional aid from Admiral Zimmerman the attack of the one hundred big ships and a thousand gun boats was resumed, and the batteries here were at last silenced, and the landelinians compelled to retreat. During the attack the Angolinian transport called the Gertrude Angel ship was aided by Captain Phillip Ant one was struck by a shell on its water line and foundered in the rough sea caused by the shocks of so many thousands of big shell explosions and roar of cannons. Those on board being a large battalion of marines under Colonel Casey were transferred with the greatest difficulty to one of the other ships called the St Ann. The transport was an enormous ship and was not originally intended for river work as she could even risk the furies of the Mic-Ho-letstlinian deers. While during the engagement few incidents during the war or the siege of Vivian Lake displayed more courage and coolness than the action of a commander of an Angolinian gunboat crew in burning the landelinian fire raft before it could be used against a portion of the besieging ships. After setting the five hundred foot long barge loaded with materials soaked with oil, the Angolinian sailors were pulling back to one of the Angolinian ships which was the nearest for safety, when a shell from fortress Gertrude Angeline struck the boat, killing and wounding every one in it. The captain though wounded succeeded in rescuing those who survived the disaster and the rest who were not killed were saved by another crew of a gunboat.

At the same time during the engagement Colonel Hanson dispatched a rebel flagship with two hundred big side guns and seventeen nine inch guns followed by six transports with extra cannons, ammunition and provisions to the rebel camps thus being bombarded. While this sh these ships were landing their stores into many boats they were attacked about six o'clock in the afternoon by the Angolinian steamer Beldonia and two warships which came from the direction of Childs Island and after a brief engagement the Angolinian warship, and its six transports had to surrender.

The christian fleet on the following morning then steamed up the stream to bombard fortress Gertrude Angeline which was a long irregular and bastioned and curtained work of immense size and height constructed on a long high bluff eighty feet above the high water mark of the river, and in a position commanding many important points and channels in the Vivian Lake river harbor. The whole plan of attack had been admirably arranged by Admiral Zimmerman, and was at once, extremely daring, simple and original. It was for the fleet of ships to describe a wide circle following one another, each giving its fire on the big fortresses it steamed past. The firing on both sides was incessant and tremendous, the roar and thunder of guns being dreadfully loud, and about afternoon three of the ships approached within six hundred yards of the fort and delivered their broadsides with a deliberation and effect that was terrible. This desperate combat lasted for about all day, principally with ten and nine inch explosive shells, and when the firing redoubled it seemed apparently that though the rebel guns were being silenced one by one, they always had more to take their places. Ten ships in that day were sunk and forty disabled.

On the night of the attack Colonel Johnston belonging to one section of the attacking transport fleet took advantage of a terrible storm of christian fire from the ships while whose concussion lashed the water into two foot waves to make a demonstration against the landelinians on island No One of the Boy's group. The night was very dark, there was all over a desperate artillery duel raging with a volcano of flame and din, and the lightning from exploding shells, and the flash of scores of thousands of guns for miles was very frequent and terribly blinding. The spray of the waves caused by the concussion of such terrible cannoning and the explosions of shells dashed clean over the banks of the river near its wide mouth the Mic-Ho-letstlinian gun I mean and altogether it was a emphatically a night of war of titans and his tempest together. And yet such was the dreadful moment chosen by Colonel Johnston to literally dash into the lions mouth, and try to split some of his iron teeth, selecting one thousand two hundred and forty of the bravest and most lion hearted men, and accompanied by many boat loads of five fifteen men each from the besieging fleets of warships, they desperately under fire proceeded on their purpose, and after a most perilous passage, they landed on that famous island. As soon as they reached the mouth of the upper forts, and under cover of darkness and from a rattling cannon fire from their own ships, they landed and moved to spike sixty big guns they found mounted, and then got away just in time before the insurgents on shore came up to stop them. A heavy fire was opened from shore but no one was injured and all returned safely to their ships.

A little before this Angolinian engineers and others who were helping in the siege were constructing more and more floating batteries, these being strangely made boats intended to carry seventeen heavy guns each. They were large one hundred feet by flatboats, very strongly built, and were moved swiftly by gasoline engines. They had their sides made of strong iron and steel about as a seventy feet high heavy enough to withstand the discharge of gusketry, rams, and canister, and all kind of artillery from heavy to light. They were covered with strong roofs and though flat had slanting sides like the "Confederate Merrimack" and were painted intolerably black and all were numbered, there being about four hundred and were altogether a very curious dreadful looking fleet evidently better adapted for hard work and horrible bombardment than for comfort.

On the following morning the bombardment of fortress Gertrude Angeline was resumed. The Angolinian offensive force consisted of six hundred big ships of war and six hundred more of big floating batteries, motor vessels, and six thousand gun boats and merrimacks. At the beginning of the firing in the morning the volleys of the landelinians fell short more than six hundred yards every time, while the effect of the shells from the christian ships on the outer works of the fort was such that after to thousand big explosions heard for a hundred miles a loud they were that the enemy retired from there, and afterwards used the guns in their own works. When the bombardment became general the fleet made an attempt to pass the big fort which was five miles long but met one of the most terrific fires of cannon ever known. Five transports, ten more battle ships, and nine merrimacks were damaged from the fire of the fort, and eight big eighty big war steamers that remained below to put the fort between two fires and out off all communications with Vivian Lake met the tremendous cannon fire from port silverbell and Marousian and had to withdraw to safety. However other ships came to the help and their united fire thundered all day and night and therefore was steadily responded to from the fort. The christian fire was mainly directed against the eastern section of the big fortresses and in the afternoon the breaches had become so wide that the arches of the casemates were laid bare. One of the most terrible events of this desperate battle was the slaughter on board the armed transport steamer called the Floating strawberry Hatch. In the midst of the wildest engagement a terrible discharge of grape from port Gertrude Angeline killed eight hundred of the crew and wounded the remainder including all of the officers at the very same minute. A war correspondent of the terrible scene told General Manson later that it was indeed the most appalling thing he had ever seen, but it only served the survivors of a following crew to renewed exertions. Lieutenant Haules Haller was one of the men who fought his guns with great gallantry and was one of the very few who escaped.

the hour of wrath arose roaring from the deep abyss of war, the high steeples of every Galverinian city rocked to bells of doom, the call went out for more volunteers, flaming passion arose, seventy-five million from city town and mountain farm poured out in answer, flags were affiant in thousands in every town and in millions in the wilderness hills were ringing, drum beats, bugle calls, black looks to southward, even Galverinian women too thronged through the streets. In excitement, fear and emotion, women with pale faces, and sad prophetic eyes and with weeping. Evil tidings of Ganderon came, the Ganderonians there under Kerr after tenacious fighting of two weeks, being routed two thousand miles, on toward, before forced to throw down their arms and surrender. Another series of disasters occurred at Margeret run, Mary Kerr, Joan, Iain, and Davis Kerrigan, where the Ganderonians though defeated were able to inflict terrific loss upon the Christians during these battles, each of which lasted from two to four weeks. The latter two of four weeks duration starting June 4th were the fiercest. The total losses in those battles, battles, was 12,043,398.

The month of July had passed and gone. And still Manley though heavily reinforced still remained inactive continually retreating before the advance of Zimmerman's army now. Violet and her sisters were still with general Vivian who was making another advance, and wondering exceedingly how this campaign now toward Glorinia was going to turn out became anxious. Though they heard that general Manley was now retreating before Zimmerman, they knew Manley of his father and son too well to be deceived by his long absence from battle, and had a foreboding feeling at times that some great disaster would happen to the Christian armies, when well within the heart of the Galverinian country.

Many times when the little girls would feel this way their suspicions would turn out to be correct. Nevertheless the little girls felt very happy over the progress the Christians were now making, and continually prayed that it would continue and end the war.

Evans had not been away from Violet and her sisters a day since the great Glorinia campaign began because being now in the heart of the enemy infested parts of Galverinia he feared their perils would be redoubled, and that he must watch them more closely. It happened that during the last desperate fray with Manley at Gromer Andrea the two companions of Starring had been caught spying within the Christian lines, and though they had been successful in breaking away and rescuing Starring who had been a prisoner so long, and as usual accompanied Jack Evans and scores of his best mounted Continentians had chased them for ten miles, up hill and down on at woods and fields over bridges, and through little villages, and finally the three ladies coming to another bridge over a broom, and finding a path leading to the brook used by travelers, to water their horses, and finding that from the water to the under part of the bridge there was space for three to stand without landing in their hands, the three bitter enemies of the Vivian girls, had decided what to do as to be captured or seen now meant death, as the pursuers would shoot them down on sight. They urged their horses down the path to the brook quickly, dismounted, and hid their intelligent animals to go on, and as the horses walked under the bridge came to a stop, the three ladies affixed the fresh tracks leaped into the water, and in a moment were upon the back backs of their horses lying along their necks. Beyond the bridge were two roads and in a short time the Angelinians led by Evans arrived at the bridge and went thundering across the columns separating into two, each taking one of the two roads, and going along side the bank of the brook sought sight of the three fugitives, surrounded the bridge, and after a desperate fight, in which ten of the Angelinians were killed, and thirty wounded, finally overpowered the ladies, and brought them back to the camp as prisoners. However Violet and her sisters had not known that their enemies had been captured, until August 2nd when the Christians had halted at Prostain, when general Manley's aid had become known threatening in its attitude. They were sitting on a lone log, Evans standing by a tree close to them watching away on a branch with his rifle when they saw the ladies pass under a guard to the prison camp. They had also seen the little girls, but only assumed a suspicious expression. Fredrick alone shook his fist at them. Evans happened to see this but only smiled, Violet looked at them then the two ladies had also been captured, and how did Starring escape?

"I captured them during the last battle of Gromer Andrea on or later." He said in a curly manner. "The young fools shot down forty of my men before we overpowered them for which they shall pay a heavy cost! It was they who poisoned Starring's mind against you little girls. He told me all and told me that now he does see his folly, though he never expects forgiveness from general Vivian. He has been weeping for days because you little girls were so harsh with him, and he told me that he would give anything, even his life if you little girls forgave him. But the other two ladies they are insane with rage because you little girls were not captured."

"Well we can feel safer now that the two were captured." Said Violet with confidence. "But if we do forgive Starring we cannot save his life."

"I know it." Said Evans soberly. "General Vivian intends to have him executed on the thirty first of this month of August, though he has not passed the decree or if he has it cannot be done as yet, because Hanson has not confirmed it. If you little girls do forgive him and expect to save him you had better see general Hanson about it before he confirms the order of sentence. Otherwise it will be too late."

"We were too harsh to the poor boy though, none of us meant it. It was only to let him know how he hurt us." Said Jennie. But we cannot intercede for him if he repeats his actions toward us because he is facing death. It must be that he is sorry that he offended us, only, otherwise we would only make Uncle Hanson angry for trying to intercede for him, and it will only be still worse for him and we would get our own wishes."

"It's you little girls he feels for only only." Said Evans. "He does not care a bit about the sentence, and he had dared general Vivian again and again to put him to death right away, and I don't think general Vivian really dares."

"Are we allowed to see him?" I asked Jennie. "Yes I can permit it." Said Evans. "My guards are at his prison tent, and with my written permission you could be able to go and see him. We will go together to his prison tent to night, for it is a better time to see him. But while you're there I'll have to double the guards, in case he would make a break to escape."

When the time appointed came they went toward the location of the prison camp, Starring being of course the only one occupying it now as mostly all the other prisoners had been interned in the main war prisoners prison.

They were readily admitted into the camp by the guards, and they at once proceeded for the tent in which Starring was confined, the tent being well guarded. The guards seeing the little girls with Evans allowed them to pass into the tent, two of the guards following at the request of Evans. Starring was reclined in the corner of the tent, having probably been asleep, and it was the first time that Starring had ever seen Violet and her sisters at such close quarters, and never before had he realized their dazzling beauty, their spiritual eyes, and such holy innocence. And he also noticed that something like a halo circled about above their heads, and he arose politely yet awed in their sudden presence.

"Well." Said Evans. "We are here. Violet and her sisters came to tell you that they are willing to forgive you if your sinner in your sorrow for the abuse of them, and they will get your sentence taken off by going to general Hanson the main commander. They will intercede for you. But don't try no breaks."

The little girls had a short interview with Starring and then the next morning went to intercede for him telling general Hanson that it was mostly the fault of the ladies two companions who had misled them. They told him that the ladies had been heartily sorry for what he had done to them, and even told general Hanson that he proved it by embracing them, and so on. They also told general Hanson that his two companions were poor prisoners within the lines, and they should be the ones to pay, as they caused Starring to do what he did, by false statements against them.

But the general was obdurate.

"He's a spy and deserves to be hanged as a spy." He roared. "I don't want to commit a sin for saving it but just the same I would not fail to commit a sin to confirm the sentence if the blessed virgin begged me to do it herself. General Vivian has already passed the decree, and I will confirm it. So don't mention the matter again. Besides all he has done to you and your sisters is no excuse. He was a shaking coward to do it, just because he was afraid to show friendship, when he knew he would lose their confidence in him."

And that was how he gave what that day I count as had as the betrayal of Christ. He caused you as much trouble as any of the wicked Ganderonians generals did, and when he was captured once or twice before your father allowed him pardon at your request, and see he who repaid you'll be a little more than a little more. You could say yourselves to death, and it would not save him. So my request is not to let him come for his interest in the nation again, or I'll look upon you little girls as fools, and remain firm in my refusal as well."

"But you and the general Vivian had promised us anything we would ask." "A" said Violet, "And if you refuse now you will be breaking sacred pledges. We are not interfering for his two companions, for they don't deserve it. And when he is sorry for his offenses you ought to take pity on him. Our Lord requests under pain of sin that we forgive even the meanest offenders, or otherwise we will not be forgiven ourselves."

"There is nothing you say will turn me," answered general Hanson angrily. "When I say NO I mean NO, and that is all there is to it. Were you to fall down on your knees I would not move. We have had about enough of his pranks and will stand for no more. So not another word, or you will arouse me to rage even against you."

Violet and her sisters saw that it was useless to argue with their uncle who so continued:

"And as to promises I do not include scoundrels and rascals in that pledge and neither did your father. It was a promise to oblige only everything that was good for you. So I'm breaking no pledges. So back to Evans and forget the rascal, and don't be foolish."

Violet and her sisters went back to where they left Evans and told him the result.

"We can't do anything," said Jennie. "Uncle won't listen to a word. And the decree was already passed anyhow and is on the way to him. Starring is done for, for he won't yield to my request."

"It's best not to bother him then," said Evans. "The THE had was a fool to listen to the poisoning advice of his two really scoundrel companions. If you little girls cannot turn general Hanson, nobody can."

The little girls were loathe to tell Starring that they failed to save him, but nevertheless went and broke the news to him. "Well I'll die hard," cried Starring. "And he calls me a spy, the dirty unforgiving christian dog of Satan. He is a damn liar if he says I'm a spy and he cannot prove it. I was taken prisoner during a battle without any provocation whatever, and was not even spying at the time. But I should worry though your attempt to save me proves you little girls true friends, despite all I have done to you. But just the same it will take more than general Vivian and Hanson to cause my death. I do not fear death in battle or when captured as a spy, but to be assassinated to satisfy the passion of that bulldog Hanson Vivian, I'll not stand for and I'll defy him before all in heaven to dare to kill me. He just let him dare come for me and I'll show them what I'm made of."

"You had better be careful," said Evans. "There is no one who can outlandish general Vivian or his brother. If they are ever set upon a purpose they will carry it out. And it was your foolishness that brought you into this trouble. You ought not to have listened to your two forward lieutenants. They themselves brought this cruel fate upon you. And besides celestial being promised before our very eyes, destruction upon any one persecuting the Vivian girls under any conditions. And you fell into this very trap of doom. I'm surely afraid nothing can save you now."

Three more days finally passed, and though the christian troops continually advanced, deeper with in the region occupied by the enemy Hanley still continued to face Gloriana and was reported that the retreating was a false rumor that he was concentrating in greater forces than ever along the Aronburg run stream. This news worried general Vivian but nevertheless he continued to advance, notwithstanding the impending situation, though several of his best generals had advised him to be cautious for they all knew Hanley's treacherous ways before now and feared the war was reaching its high water mark.

It was the rumor that Hanson who was far behind had been in severe action at Rosanna Maran, but nevertheless it could not be confirmed that he was victorious as it was reported, and he himself even denied that he had been in action. Yet it had finally turned out that a part of Hanson army without his knowing it had been in severe action with the enemy at Rosanna Maran but that the enemy under Federal had withdrawn without a general battle, but had failed to retreat and Hanson was unable to advance, which filled him with rage and disappointment.

Violet and her sisters themselves had heard the noise of the actual battle, but had seen nothing of it, and reported what they heard to general Vivian. It was then evident that Hanley had intended to offer some resistance, by throwing Federal and Ambrose in the way, and had succeeded in checking the advance of general Hanson thus separating him from general Vivian, but nevertheless something must have happened to cause general Federal to withdraw when general battle was impending. Nevertheless Violet and her sisters were happy that a general battle had not occurred after all, though this action at Rosanna Maran had been extremely sanguinary and terrific for the leaders to wish to give any account of the horrible losses.

They happened to be away from Evans that day, since morning, until evening and then he came to them with the startling news that all rumors about the withdrawal of Federal had been false that the attack of the glandelinians at Rosanna Maran had been completely victorious had rescued Starring and his two companions and carried them off safely within their own lines and that many many generals on the christian side were down and that forty divisions of men many millions strong on the christian side had been mowed down.

Violet and her sisters boldly and openly admitted to Evans that they thanked god with all their heart that Starring had escaped, that they had not spoken to Hanson since he refused their request, that they were not sorry he was defeated, but that just the same they feared that his two companions would cause them more trouble than before and felt reluctant over the escape of these two young rascals. They had hopes that Starring would remain resolute in his promises, not to persecute them again, but of his two companions they feared the most for now they would try to get revenge for what they themselves went through, when captured by their christian enemies. But said to say at the battle of Gloriana following Starring had been the same lad again though for the last time and treated the little girls most harshly. He did it to spite general Hanson. Nevertheless the little girls were not frightened, and neither were they remorseful or sad. To them about even Hanson defeat it mattered nothing, at least Starring was saved from Hanson's wrath, whom they were sure of. However the little girls felt that their sorrows were not all over, though being confident in the protection of Jack Evans, and just now felt perfectly at ease. Their own mother and Aunt had remained in Calvernia where they felt they would be more safe, and sometimes Violet and her sisters wished they had remained in Abbeannian, but then they did not like to leave their father and Evans behind, and besides they wanted to see the ending of the war, with their very eyes and witness the surrender of the Glandelinian king glandlin."

JACK EVANS AGAIN HAS AN OUTBURST ...

It was during a wet Sunday it having rained all morning, that Evans and the little girls having come from high Mass in the K O Building that he noticed how exceedingly beautiful Violet and her sisters looked in their pure white clothes, which he admired, and which he himself had worked hard to keep in that pure spotless white like the purities of their tender little hearts. They looked so beautiful in those white clothes that he could not help pressing Jennie and Violet closer to him and as they walked along Evans was carrying a heavy pearl handled umbrella belonging to a Joyce on his left forearm, and as he was teasing the little girls playfully, tickling them in the side of the neck, and elsewhere, a long came a man wearing civilian clothes, running carelessly, and dashing near them recklessly, stepped in a mud puddle with such force, as to splash a shower of mud over the clothes of the little girls and on his face.

Evans was furiously enraged, and knowing by action that the man was no christian, as well as no gentleman he recovered from his embarrassment and sent his umbrella flying, he handled foremost straight as an arrow, and the handle of the umbrella struck the careless man on the back of the head with such force as to send the fellow flying flat on his face making him see almost a million stars at the same time. Evans quickly ran up picking up the umbrella and then said: "I don't know who you are, and I don't care. But hereafter looking look where you are stepping when in such a hurry."

And then he was off with the little girls once more, the careless fellows looking after the retreating figures in distasteful

"He deserved it," said Violet her eyes brimming with tears. "My best white dress is ruined."

"So is mine," said Jennie. "He probably did it on purpose."

"I'll get that mud out," said Evans. "I'll see to it that they will remain as white as before."

Four violet and her sisters were a sorry sight, when reaching the main interior of the christian line but they rapidly changed their clothes, Evans attending to the soiled ones.

"My but that was a good wallop you handed that fellow," said Joice. "You threw at as straight as aiming a pistol shot at the bulls eye. It was almost comical to see how he sprawled."

"The sight of your spotted garments made me lose my temper," said Evans seriously. "And I was perfectly justified in giving him that rap as I believed he done that on purpose, not believing believing that I could repay him so easily as I did."

Later on while the christian armies were resuming their advance, Evans had planned to start up a collection from among the soldiers, for the Vivian girls so as to buy them some presents, when the opportunity presented itself. During the next half twenty eight miles north, of the boundary line between Francis Atlanta, and Aron Aronburgs run,

Evans started his collection among the soldiers, receiving more than he had expected, as all the soldiers were willing to give and do anything for the little girls. Evans went from man to man, writing down his name when he gave an offering, so as to give his name to the priest and gain him a blessing for his kindness at the same time.

At last reaching something like a pathway, in which children under the protection of guardians were playing, he spied a well dressed civilian sitting on a park bench smoking a long cigar. Evans did not know that this fellow was a glandelinian officer in disguise, who watching for a certain child among the others, whom he wished to seize, but nevertheless he strolled up in front of him eyed him critically, as he did not like his looks, and said:

"My friend I'm General Jack Evans, guardian of the Vivian girls. I'm collecting for them a little sum of money to surprise them on their birthday which is soon coming. I believe you know how dear they are and would be glad to contribute for their sake. Only a quarter would be all I request."

"Whether I know how dear those centepeds are or not is my own private affair sir," shot back the man. "They can die before I'll yield them a blade of grass."

"Neither would any other other disguised praycoat contribute for them," Evans also shot back, simultaneously delivering a telling blow, that sent the man sprawling backwards head first over the top of the bench, upsetting it at the same time. "Take that for insulting them." Evans then immediately left the park, and boarded a train for the nearest town. The coach was quite empty especially the one he occupied, and to his surprise he saw that violet occupied a seat far in front of him saying her poetry to herself. A strange man had come in at the same time he did, and also a lighthouse there were plenty of empty seats, he preferred to settle himself into the one occupied by violet, much to her annoyance, snatching the beads from her, throwing them out of the given window, slapping and pummeling her, tearing off her hat, and pulling her hair vice violently. This was more than Evans could stand and he immediately rushed to her assistance, knocking the raucous almost senseless, by throwing him lengthwise across the top of the seat behind, then pulling him down, put him off the train while it was still running pretty fast.

"It was lucky that I boarded this train," said Evans sitting with her.

"He probably was a disguised glandelinian that tried to harm you," Evans said. "Where are you going, and why are not your sisters with you?" Why we were playing in an empty box car, not knowing it was attached to a freight train that I had just pulled in," said violet. "It started off all of a sudden, and though my sisters got off it was going too fast when it came my turn to jump. So I staid on, until it was reached it is first stop, where I got off and caught this train just in time."

"So the joke was on you after all," said Evans. "How far are you going. As far as the christian lines."

"There is where I wanted to get off," said violet. "But where are you going?"

"On to the 'con north of the christian lines," said Evans. "I'll be there in a few minutes."

as he did not want to tell her yet what his plan was. "I intended to buy some pretty things I saw displayed in a show window. If you want to come along you can," put that distance for you."

"It's all right," said violet rapturously. "I'm riding free. The conductor knows me, and refused to take the ticket I bought, and made the ticket agent give me my money back."

"That is some respect for the little girls," he said to her. "Let some other smart try anything on her and her sisters again."

and I'll rap him far worse than I did the other three."

After leaving the town they returned for the christian lines, it being now dark as pitch, and all of a sudden a body of glandelinian soldiers were suddenly seen coming at a double quick racing after a man who was dressed as a civilian.

EVANS AND VIOLET ARE LOST.

Keeping under the shelter of fences and hedges, Evans and the little girl made for a patch of woodland, which hid them from the mans pursuers. "Let's wait here for a few minutes little girl to get breath," said Evans, and as he spoke there was the loud report of a musket, followed by a series of scattered shots. The patch of woodland in which Evans and the little Vivian Girl were hiding was not large, and before long they had reached the farther side, and stopped short to crouch down among the bushes fearing to go out into the open country, which they knew swarmed with Glandelinians.

"The Glandelinians would see us," said violet. "There is another volley. Doesn't that show the Glandelinians have not been able to hit their guttie?"

"Of course," said Evans. "But hand hang the fugitive. It's us who have to look out for them." And then after listening while the firing kept on sounding more and more distant till it stopped altogether, he held his breath in dread lest the graycoats would come back and strike through the woods. As soon as the graycoats were surely gone Evans and the little girl started off side along beside the woodland, then by hedges and ditches, and on an and on keeping to the open country, and avoiding every strange light they seen the little girl trudging away, while whenever she showed weariness Evans would carry her, or pick out some beautiful flowery path rise on the side of a pine wood, that they might rest though they dared not sleep on account of the many dangers lurking everywhere so far from the christian lines. But the way was rough and long and the enthusiasm of the little Vivian girl had lasted until nine o'clock, the feet of the little girl dragging heavily, a great thirst and hunger troubling both. They soon however reached a little stream which cut its way through the sandy land, just at the very edge of a pine wood, to sink a little once upon the cool bank. There were no fish visible, but the clear water was delicious, and they drank long and deeply before bathing their weary and sore feet in the stream.

"What fun," cried violet reviving a little as she buried her pretty feet in the soft cool dry sand, and let it trickle between her toes.

But a cloud came over her face directly after, for it was many hours since anything had passed her lips. There was an abundance of deadwood low down about the trunk of fir trees, but no flint or steel of tinder or matches to obtain fire, and midnight was very near. Evans looked far and near but no farm house or village was in sight and when after a long rest he prepared that they should make a final start, and violet replaced her socks and shoes, she slipped when she stood up, and in spite of a brave effort the tears would come to her eyes.

"Let's rest a little longer," said Evans tenderly as he led the way a short distant distance into what proved to be a vast forest where the leaves that had fallen for ages lay in a thick dry bed.

"Let's try here," said Evans as he looked a hollow beneath the great far spreading boughs, which were thick enough to form a shelter from any wind or rainstorm that may come.

"Lie down violet dear," said Evans with gentle. "And the little glanced at him pitifully and observed:

"Oh, don't look at me as a reprehensibly poor violet." Sighed Evans to himself as the weary child's eyes looked large and dark in the shade, but only for a few moments before they grew dull, and then the lids fell and she was sleeping so soundly that when he guardian raked the sweet scented leaves round her till she lay as if it were in a nest, and only a few minutes after Evans had sunk lower and lower drooping over his little charge to keep watch, but only to leave that to the great bright stars which peered down among the leaves at the dark spot, where the traveler, young and old were sleep sleeping soundly. Violet was the first to awake in the soft gray morning to his listening to irregular sharp tapping made by a busy woodpecker some where among the ancient trees, and she wondered wondered for some time what it meant, and where she was.

But asoft leap breath close to her ear made her start around so suddenly that she awoke back Evans who started up looking as surprised at Violet did.

"I could not recall to where I was," said Violet. "I am no hungry."

"And no wonder my poor little girl here and come and bathe your face & with me, and at all costs we must get to some farm house, and beg or buy our breakfast, I have a lot of money with me."

He bathing was soon at an end and though disposed to limp a little Violet stepped out bravely in the direction Evans chose, and with such good effect that before long the chimney of a farm house was seen for which they made for at once.

"Now," said Violet eagerly, "and a man milking." It was as the little girl had said, for half a dozen cows were dreamily munching grass, while a sour looking man was seated upon a stool. Evans walked up at once, the man being so intent upon the milking that he did not raise his head till Evans spoke a spoke, when he started so violently, that he nearly upset the pail.

"Who are you? What is it?" he cried.

"We are travelers and hungry," replied Evans. "Will you sell us some?"

He got no further.

"Here I know you are. You are the damn old Abhiemnian spy damn old Vivian's friend who is commander of the dirty old army of christian poodle dogs, and that is what his little centepede. I know you and what you have done. You have brought the Angeliens here to take the place."

"Indeed you wrong me, sir," cried Evans humbly. "It is a mistake. A MISTAKE," cried the man furiously. "You will soon find out that it is for you and the little Angeliens dog with you. Our soldiers were here looking for you last night. I know where they are now."

"I cannot help it," said Evans sadly. "The poor little girl is starving. She has not eaten anything since breakfast yesterday. I will pay you well, sir, for all you sell me."

"I sell to a dog of a christian spy. NEVER A BIT OF A DROP. OUT OF HER. He shouted his words in rage opening a big knife in a threatening manner."

"Indeed you are mistake sir. Pay sell us bread and milk for the poor little girls sake. He is starving."

"Let her starve in prison then. Off with you---off."

"Advanced upon them with so fierce a gesture that Evans caught Violet's arm thrust her behind so as to screen her from danger and drawing his gun said:

"My man, I'm no puppet, and neither is the child a centepede. Evans any further with that knife toward us, and I'll shoot you dead where you stand. I'm not far from the christian lines, and since you refuse this little girl something to eat, you won't retain this farm long, for I'll see to your going, and no that pail of milk, and a sket of food, and be quick about it too."

He far farmer cowered at the leveled gun, but refused to do as ordered under any conditions, Evans at snatching up the milk and baked basket of food and backing away.

"The farmer made no attempt to follow and Evans said, 'You are a Glandelinian, and I warn you that if you are not out of this local location by tomorrow morning you will be a prisoner.'"

And with this he walked away with the little Vivian girl. Evans and his little charge trampled steadily on that morning, and for several days tapping and buying, until one morning in the distance they saw suddenly stretched out before them a long line of something which kept on glittering in the sunlight.

"Soldiers," cried Violet, "I know. We can see the bayonets on their guns. It must be my father's men." "In purple coats," Violet. "Asked Evans as if. Violet was silent for a few moments as she stood with her brow knit before saying slowly, "No their coats are gray after all, and they have wide lapels and pants. We have been going toward the enemy's lines."

There was nothing for it to do but to turn back and then strike off in another direction, which they followed until over the last tree bread was eaten, the milk they had obtained at another farm house having been finished at noon, and the remainder put away.

Before their bread was half gone one after another there came the report of heavy heavy guns in the distance and bullets zipped about Evans and the little girls. In the distance it could be seen that clouds were rising like those in a storm, but they were clouds of smoke slowly gathering in a burning forest miles and miles away, and the gloom increased. Knowing to be pursued by Glandelinians they hurried on for quite two hours, and then hot and weary, Evans suffering less than violet however they slackened their pace, and once more making for a patch of woodland rested for while in the darkest part but not for long. They had hardly started on again before the crash of many guns made them start to their feet, violet beginning to run out in the open in her sudden alarm, but only to turn back dired directly and catch Evans hand.

"I," cried Evans drawing her in amongst the thickest group of trees, "that was running into fresh danger."

"Violet was already looking at a swarm of men who seemed to have suddenly started out of the ground a hundred yards away, and racing toward them like mad steeds. At the same moment Evans threw himself down amongst the thick brush dragging Violet with him.

"Is close," he whispered. "Or they are Glandelinians who are looking for us. And it was well that they were both lying flat for there was a flash of light a long line of smoke, and in response to a sharp pattering a sound a little shower of twigs and leaves on me or dropping on and around Evans and Violet."

His was answered by firing evident from the other side of the woods again and again the reports came, each time sounding more and more near while as Violet lay flat upon her face she could hear tramping and the sound of men hurrying among the trees right past them, two now ing so near that Violet wondered that they were not seen.

The smoke of the musketry filling the woods hung low and seemed to cling to the lower branches of the trees. A sharp volley from another direction was followed by the pattering down of more twin twigs and leaves and it was evident that the Glandelinians were trying to shoot them both down for soon as the firing ceased, several had whispered in returning that the two fugitives they had seen which made them start firing were gone. It was not until midnight that they could venture to leave the wood and it was by guess work for the stars were clouded over so that Evans made for what he reckoned to be the north, but not to go far in the darkness on account of the twinkling fires which shone out here and there in groves as if all, all around them. The rest of the night they slept in another wood, to keep on starting up from time to time, during the night, awakened now by a shower of shots, and twice by the sound of a horn, which came from the direction of the watch fires. Early in the morning about three o'clock it being still pitch dark, the two unable to sleep in the noise arose, but every attempt to get out of the woods was in vain, for they were surrounded by a vast army, whom they knew not, where nearest them were dotted many more fire camps and there they were sure it was not the christian armies for they hardly ever allowed their camp fires to be seen, keeping their camps in utter darkness, so as to surprise a foe who may be prowling near their lines. But however they decided to make a brave effort to get right away, but they had traveled only a short distance when Violet's heart seemed to stand still, for just in front where all looked dark as pitch there came the sudden rattle of musketry and a voice shouted in plain Angeliens:

"Halt who goes there. Fire! Friend or foe?"

"Stop for pity's sake," cried violet. "Don't fire." There was a rush and they were surrounded. Violet being seized roughly by two soldiers while two more dragged Evans to his knees, and as he shook them loose with his strong arms he was set upon by a dozen and held fast.

"It's a not a monster sergeant," cried one of the men. "Hold still! you're holding little woman," cried another.

"I won't," Grid violet. "Let me go / let me go!"

"How then who are you?" Grid a harsh harsh loud voice out of the darkness. "Thought we could feel on with our deasy first and second."

"Said from the Mandelstein camp sergeant. Deeper than it is certain. Said another of voice. "Don't take them prisoners shoot them where they are."

"Silence in the ranks for me!" Roared the sergeant. "Now then who are you?"

"I'm an Angellinan general with our deasy first and second."

to escape through the Mandelstein camp. Said Kenna hungrily now realize realizing they were Angellinians.

"Won't do," Said the sergeant. "And attempt at Abt. Angellinians." "Why you were sneaking toward our line like two phantoms speaking low throat or in Mandelstein and in Angellinians."

"Yes I'm an Angellinan a guardian of this life in first daughter of an Angellinan general."

"Hah," Grid the sergeant. "What a town tale. You talked Mandelstein or some thing and I heard the little girl say some something in Mandelstein."

"Yes sometimes we talk in Mandelstein just for fun," Said violet.

"Oh indeed. Well you are producers now and the little girl shall be thought not to speak Mandelstein hereafter. Bring the along."

"Bring them along." "I his to the men."

"No wait a minute." He suddenly added. "See how they think on my lady. What papers have you?"

"Papers sir."

"Yes dispatches. Let letters."

"Only my pocket book." Said Kenna.

"Get it sergeant." Grid one of the men.

"Nothing else."

"No sergeant not that I can find."

"Perhaps they are hidden upon the little girl. Likely enough. And it is a shame that we will have to shoot her for spying too. But it can't be helped. It is the law."

Violet soon found it was in vain to resist and she had to suffer being roughly searched, but the Angelinians found nothing on her but some religious articles and a small Catholic prayer book which they returned to her. This did not even convince them that they were mistaken. The prison prisoners were marched off: at once, through the dark ness toward where the fires were burning brightly, and after being eye challenged again, and again, the sergeant led them to the front of a tent out of which a couple of generals evidently high in command came quickly, were about to hurry away, but stoped a few moments to listen to the sergeant's report.

"You are sure they have no dispatchers upon them?"

"Certain, sir. They have been searched twice."

"Let them be detained," said the officer sharply. "But they are not to be ~~con~~ condemned as no evidence is found on them."

The sergeant marched them off to a large tent and into this the two prisoners were ushered, to find themselves in company with some half a dozen Attisaniian soldiers playing pig mes, or ta kink, and laughing, the dim light from a lantern swinging from the tent pole striking strangely up upon the faces of the redcoats, who sat red at the prisoners sulkily for a few moments, and then turned their backs to renew playing, or talking while Evans pressed close to Violet and tried to cheer her up.

will soon be able to send a message to come and get us."

"You t two bad battin' to mally carnful." "Told you of the men turning around again." "T here are many of us armed soldiers, in this camp or tent but just the same I give you fair warninthat if you succeed in getting out of the tent unseen by us, there are about a score of men on duty about this tent now with orders to shoot down any one who tries to escape. And you two ought to thank your stars you have not swallowed market bait for some meaner place as you came here. W

Q What prevented the guards from firing on the spot in the voice of the pretty little girl you have with you that they heard? And you air ought to be ashamed of yourself for bringing a little girl like that among all this gunpowder, treason, and plots."

It was not until three weeks had passed during which Evans and Little Violet were all shifted from place to place, a train strictly guarded, their place being in the misery and discomfort of the baggage train, that the day came, when dirty, ragged, and weary, violated by the slide of Evans in one of the wagons on watching the marching by of the strong Abinonidian divisions. Evans had tried in vain to send messages, written, and by word of mouth, to either General Manson or General

General I, civilian, but no one would act as a bearer. Violet too had tried her best, but she could hear no news of her father, and these were times when she questioned Evans, as to which whether he thought they were not within the lines of a strange Abhannian army or not. And so it was for a time that when Violet was tired out, after one of the weary marches, and no rations were served out, her heart sank and the tears came to her eyes as she believed that she should never see her father or her dear lost sisters once more. At the times she sat with Evans in the baggage wagon with Evans watching the powder blackened soldiers, urging on the horses, drawing the thousands of heavy guns, followed by mud stained divisions, which stepped out smartly every man looking ready and willing to commence the attack to which he was bound.

divisions,, followed, the sight of the long stream of men sending a thrill through the heart of the little girl, making her lean far out from the bench beneath the wagon tilt, to cry hur-hurrah! The sound of that bright shrill bird like voice cheer cheering the men on, made them turn to look whence it came, and at the sight of the bare waving arm and its excited owner, a laugh ran along the ranks, and the men cheered again. The next minute as the cheer died out and the regular trooping beat of hundreds of thousands of marching men went on, regular its regular pulsation, Violet settled down more quietly, and watched the rest more q in silence. She did not mind after all in being among the Athenians as a prisoner, - so for any how it would not last long, but to be a away from her dear little sisters, so long was a great sacrifice indeed...(((A

These Abhianians were altogether strangers to her, neither have the Abhianians seen Violet before and had never observed a prettier child. :::: ::

They felt a pang to think such a pretty little girl was a helper of the clandestine cause if not proved to be a spy, and the leaders were indeed at a loss of what to do with them. To turn them over to general Vivian or Hanson was impossible for he was too far away, and this was general Everett's Truest Abhiannian army.

But a month after the happy day soon came.. !???
For when the army halted, in general a general civilian himself appeared, reigning in his horse, addressing to the general general of the main army and learning that two strange and peculiar prisoners had been captured he was lead toward where they were..He then spoke to one of the officers of the Abhimannu guard, but violet did not wait, but ran up to him before the guards could restrain her and cried:
"PAPA"

"Why violet how can you be capture here." He r cried as he draw her up onto his horse and embraced her. "I've find the whole country secured in trying to find you and Mark Evans."

11. "We were lost in the dark papa, after leaving the town," said Viola Violet. "We tried to find our way back, passed through the Mandolinian camp, and were arrested as spies by the sentries, under sergeant Henry Parker."

"Oh, see," said general L. Vivian. "And where is the sergeant?"
He was gone for several minutes and then came back with the sergeant having told him when he found him who the two were who he arrested.
He saluted when brought to an abrupt halt and general Vivian said:
"At the

Though you arrested my daughter and her guardian gen? general 1 Jack Evans you proved your vigilance in watching out for spies, and done your work well. But that you may know them, so that you wont mistak e them for spies again I'll present her to you. This is in violat e of one of those known as the vivar pils. Her sisters are withi n my lines. Standing to general Jack Evans of the Albinonian counch linian everly.

"I am sorry," said Violet, looking up at him.
The sergeant looked at Violet closely and then extending his arm around her said;
"Why pardon for our conduct toward you little girl. As your real father is revealed you and your guardian are no longer no longer prisoners."
"It's all right," said Violet smiling. "It only shows your wishfulness" for the spies and how difficult it is for them to get in without detection. But this Abbie's army is the only one that allows its camp fires to be seen now. Why is that?"

The sergeant laughed.

"I thought your little vivian girls had the knowledge about camp fires and the like." He said. "When led within our main lines, did you not my little girl, observe total darkness?"

"Yes I'll have to admit that I did observe darkness." Said Violet. "I believe those fires were made to make the Glandelinians think you were less watchful than other armies, which would lure them into a trap and to instant destruction or capture. And to cause the spies to be bewildered or lost like we were."

"Exactly." Said the sergeant. "But your father is waiting for you so you had better go back with him to his army, and your papa and I shall go with you."

They were soon on the way with general Vivian the self-same sergeant being needed by the great general, having went alone, and within half an hour they were within the main line, Violet being reunited with her sisters, who were interested when she told them of the experience she and Evans had.

"We were almost arrested ourselves." Said Jennie. "We were on the way yesterday evening to try and find you and Evans, and ran plump into a picket line of the Glandelinians' army. The men did not know us, never heard of us before, and would have detained us, had not general Orwell, under Johnston's command at the moment with a party of general officers, and interceded for us. It shows that no spies can enter our lines, especially at night when though the pickets are too numerous to count by day, they were redoubled at night. We feel safe though, only within the lines, now, as everywhere outside the lines, the enemy scouts are swarming like a farm of humble bees from a field of hives."

"We are not afraid of them though." Said Violet. "And we will take good care that they don't lay hold of us again. We have had enough experience already."

Jennie remembered her last suffering during her captivity with the old Augustina St. Lars and suddenly remembered when Evans came for her in the midst of a forest fire had struck her cruel master on the face, and asked Evans what had become of the man afterwards.

"It was rumored that he probably perished in the forest fires, as I was not going to go back and rescue him after the way he had treated you." Said Evans. "When I found you you were like a bleeding corpse though alive, and when he made that remark I lost my temper and smote him to the ground. I did not care if he did perish in the conflagration though for fact he was one of our main persecutors."

"Sure he was the persecutor for the Glandelinians who persecuted us must have rescued him." Said Jennie. "And my were they not determined to capture us though. Such a race for freedom I'll never forget. But how did you find me so far away as I was?"

"I scoured the whole region and was even helped secretly by many child slaves in that location. For all you went through, every one of you little girls, Germania and the Manleys are responsible for and deserves what ought to come to them. If I was general Vivian or Hanson I would not give them any quarter, when I had them at my mercy. They do not deserve it the least."

Indeed the Manleys especially general John Manley was responsible for everything that poor Violet and her sisters suffered, and also of the Brigano affair, as he had promised a great reward to general Germania if he would get them out of the way. All the blood of the legions of slaughtered children, was also under his direction, the wanton destruction of cities and forests, also, and indeed without Evans' knowledge yet general Hanson alone, had no intentions of giving general John Manley or his brother Herman a quarter, and had passed a decree two weeks passed that no surrender of any child butchering Glandelinian general and his army shall be accepted.

For all that happened the torture of his little women, who deserved it not, the assassinations of millions of children, thousands of priests and monks, and the wanton destruction of Glandelinia was to pass very dearly for. He had intentions of destroying all of the armies under the Manleys, completely wrest the whole country from the Glandelinian government, and overthrow their wicked state of satanic government completely.

Glandelinia if unable to make up for the wanton destruction in Galver Galver's Glandelinia, was to lose her freedom, and would also be devastated and her cities and towns besides, forests laid in ruins for ransoming. Glandelinia would receive the double punishment of a criminal first and of a prisoner of war, and if was unable to be caught if he did escape, Glandelinia would receive no respite, unless he was given up to the Glandelinian authorities. Many Manley also realized the peril indeed, and knowing that if general Vivian and his Hanson once set their foot on the Glandelinian soil, he decided to stand his ground against his advance and check them at the risk of annihilation. He realized he must do this, by all means, no matter what the cost and right as soon as possible, as any delay would mean a serious disaster.

General Vivian's army was ten miles north of the region of Aronburge and after the twenty first of September arrived, there being a long lull of inactivity, the heat of the Glandelinian weather being sizzling. Manley had an idea that the heat played badly with the Christian armies, as he believed they were unused to such hot Glandelinian weather, but they felt it no more than the men in the Glandelinian armies did.

General Vivian saw the Glandelinian armies finally making a halt, and did likewise, but extending his armies in the shape of an angle, so as to prevent any tricks that Manley might attempt during an attack. He also placed strong batteries of artillery, to guard a entire flank, consisting of long range and mostly machine guns of every type. Violet and her sisters seeing the signs of a coming battle, of terrible fury at that, clung to Evans begging him for their sake to remain out of the deadly war storm. However he had been commanded by general Vivian to remain with the vivian girls under all circumstances, to keep them out of the fire zone, and watch out for prowling Glandelinian soldiers, who may be watching their chances, to seize the little girls and carry them off.

Evans determined to do this, for at that he was doing more service for his country, by protecting the vivian girls, than fighting the foe, though he would love to get a chance to pop some more of the Glandelinian generals.

He decided to do so, when a chance presented itself, and to get one of the Manleys if possible too. He had a special grudge against general John Manley in person and would give anything, to bring about his immediate downfall, especially his destruction for his cruelty to the poor vivian girls. The Glandelinian halt had been made during the time Violet and Evans had first seen the Glandelinians pursuing the man, and it was also the reason of their own slight experiences with the Glandelinians and the others. Later in the morning finding that he was still there, in spite of the warning, Evans had directed the seizure of the farm, belonging to the man, who had refused to aid him and Violet, when asked for something to eat, but at the approach of the Glandelinians, the farmer had fled only to be hounded down later in the day and shot to death because he would not stop when ordered to do so. Toward the afternoon, Evans out scouting saw that a string of Glandelinians a road wide, with artillery between them were crossing three hastily constructed pontoon bridges, and returning to camp manned his guns toward the point to the amusement of the vivian girls and ordered general John Evans his brother to let loose a storm of shells.

"They must not cross those bridges on this Aronburge run stream under any condition." He said. "Fire."

The first volley was too high and so was the second, but the third landed among the pontoons, there being a series of water eruptions, smoke and wreckage of boats, and cannons, men floundering in the water by hundreds, horses making wild leaps into the air, and a general confusion ensued among the general gray columns.

Rage curses and oaths issued from the Glandelinians, scores fired toward the Christian batteries, but no one was hit, though bullets whistled close about Violet and her sisters, who had watched this scene some twenty paces to the rear of John Evans, who were hastily unlimbering batteries of calibre cannon.

"Hurrah! Come across now if you can." Yelled the two Evans together. "Come we dare you."

The Glandelinians by this time had recovered from the Aronburge, so suddenly lasting upon them, but this part of the Aronburge Run called Francis Creek was abound in treacherous quicksands at all locations which was a road wide, especially where they were gathered.

Nevertheless the Glandelinians assayed to reform the partially damaged pontoon bridges under cover of a severe artillery fire, of their own, but Evans completed the destruction with a few more shells, and compelled the Glandelinian cannon to withdraw to safety, by hammering a score of shells at the Glandelinian guns. Why the Glandelinians wanted to cross this part of the Aronburza stream was a mystery to Evans, but nevertheless it was an intention of Evans to prevent them at all costs, which he did, the Glandelinians withdrawing out of sight, across the distant fields. Evans decided to have the affair reported to general Vivian and sent one of his men on the mission.

He had also seen that the Glandelinian general was general Boothhead, whom the Vivian girls had rescued from the geyser, and studying the event well, deemed it possible that he had forgotten the promise to Violet and her sisters, and what confirmed the suspicion all the more, because he thought sure, he saw the treacherous enemy of the Vivian girls, Braggard, among the Glandelinians also.

He reported the event to general Vivian himself, telling all his suspicions.

"It does also look suspicious to me," said general Vivian. "As from reports, I have received, John Manley is concentrating 100,000 men against the Gloria Zon Rue Becker gun, and also that attempts had simultaneously been made in hundreds of places all along the creek which was frustrated the same way, by other batteries. They intended to make an attack I'm sure. There was no other reason for this move."

Evans did not know what to say to general Vivian at this though his own suspicions differed considerably. Then then saluting he said: "I think your excelency that your statement is wrong. They could not get enough forces across such a wide stream to attack with success: our line, which borders its very bank almost. It was my belief that they were squadrons essaying to get across, and finding opportunity to seize your little daughters, slaughter them or carry them off to slavery. I saw Braggard among them, especially among the bunch I fired my artillery at. He is the cause of my suspicions." "He think you so?" Exclaimed general Vivian. "Well I'll see to it they don't succeed." "I'll make it so hot for them that they won't dare to come near the stream again."

"No further cannonading will be allowed in that line, in as it will be wasting ammunition," said General Hanson who just came up at this moment. "Withdraw the little girls or of your, within the heart of the Christian lines, let the graycoats come and across if they dare, and bag the whole of them."

"Good idea I'll do that," said general Vivian. "Evans you take the little girls within the main lines, and I'll attend to the Glandelinians."

"I'll do so your excellency," said Evans saluting, and in a few minutes he came upon the little girls, who were watching, which surprised him, large streams of graycoats, like a huge torrent, hastily crossing at many parts of the stream without pontoon bridges.

It was the same way at other portions, and so many were coming that now he suspected an attack. He quickly helped the little girls, to mount their little steeds, and the eight of them raced off toward the main line, Evans heading directly toward general Vivian's tent, and reporting again what he saw.

"You don't say!" From general Vivian. "Oh Hanson come here will you?" General Hanson came up from an opposite tent, and hearing Evans story, gave general Vivian some hasty directions, and mounting his horse raced off for his own lines. Roswell, Master Johnston examined the situation, and dashing back withdrew his lines a mile from the creek under cover of a thick woods, it being evident that a fierce attack was impending, general Vivian riding within sight of the creek, and watching the crossing of the Glandelinian troops.

As to his right there was the sound of the heaviest cannonading, ever heard since the battle of Latruva, but nothing unusual was occurring here as yet. It was evident also that the Glandelinians had found the stream less treacherous as rumored, for while columns were marching hastily across through the water, the cavalry and artillery forces, crossing the new pontoons, the infantry ploughing through the water up to their knees.

Poor Violet Violet and her sisters were horrified at the approach of the impending battle, and as the distant cannonading increased, in fury they almost wept for they had wished that the long full moon would have continued, and that they would have been able to drive the foe out of California and reached the Glandelinian capital without any other, but this. Yet they hoped and prayed that the inevitable battle, would not come after all, and that it was only a demonstration on the part of the enemy. Where Violet and her sisters were standing, unknown to them was the most perilous spot, they were ever on before, in their lives, and while they were looking on in horror at this prodigious advance of the Glandelinian troops they heard the wild gallop of a horse, and wheeling around saw that it was Gertrude Angelinasdunning, riding toward them.

"For God's sake get away from here before it is too late," she shrieked. "The main Christian batteries are in position to sweep this part of the ground with a storm of shells, and if you little girls and Evans remain here much longer, you will be blown to pieces, and the gunner won't know that they did it!"

Away they went racing toward the Christian lines, as fast as their horses could go, and a party of Glandelinians seeing them raced after them, firing their pistols furiously.

Evans was surprised at the sudden pursuit, but nevertheless they were rapidly drawing away from their graycoated Glandelinian enemies, and soon reached the Christian line, where for a while they watched the foe advance, with better safety for a while at least.

THE GLANDELINIAN ATTACK AT FRANCIS CREEK August 4-5 1915

It was evident from the great numbers advancing, that Manley was making a strong concentration of troops against the Christian line, and that a great attack of fearful violence was going to be made.

It could be seen that Manley, knowing the seriousness and fearful results, if general Hanson and Vivian kept him from concentrating successfully on Gloria or Aronburza gun now while his other scattered armies were in a crippled condition, it would be all up with his nation, and so he was bound to check the Christian forces at all hazards, by fighting with the fury of desperation, and did however the night came on without any serious happenings, the rest of the Glandelinian army crossing over. There had been some considerable cannonading, from both sides during the night, but the results were nothing important.

Morning came bright and sunny with sweltering hot weather. At the very dawn of daybreak Manley launched his forces forward, against the Christian line in their fullest strength, it being a perfect deluge of men against general Vivian's front. Yet Hanson was untouched.

It was a frightful attack, far from any imagination, inconceivable in violence, and for four hours steady the whole Christian line, was a perfect stream of flame and smoke. It happened to be that only general Vivian's line was assaulted, his Hanson's being exempted a just then, a wise act on Manley's part at that, not to assault him simultaneously, but against general Vivian the assault was driven in with such violence and furious desperation, that hundreds of Christian officers were killed or wounded in that seething inferno, the whole line was driven into the wildest confusion, and hurled back ten miles from its former position with a frightful loss.

The assault was terrific, the battle seemed lost, and everything with it. So furious was the firing on both sides that no regiments, had a flag or standard that was not in tatters. Lincoln Francis Park through which the foe streamed looked as if a tornado of great violence swept through, and the dead and wounded of both sides lay thicker than straw, from a scattered hay stack.

Everywhere there was a frightful scene of confusion, the whole of general Vivian's army was in full retreat, and the enemy were pressing or victoriously. It was evidently lucky for Violet and her sisters that they happened to be in Hanson's command at the time, and though they heard the dreadful clamor of the battle along general Vivian's line, they had no idea of the disaster that happened and neither did Hanson who wondered why his own army was not attacked.

Four hours or more passed, then the sound of firing to Hanson surprise he recoiled swiftly southward, and this filled him with suspicion. His brother was setting forward, and still the Glandelinian army along his front made no movement whatever. This filled him with greater suspicion than ever, and he decided not to wait until the foe would assault him, but finally decided to make an offensive himself, which he did and speedily too.

The Glandelinians here under general in chief/ Franciscana Damiana was taken by surprise at the suddenness of the christian assault, as the foe had not expected the christians to dare make an attack, against their unassailable position, but nevertheless the whole force at first recoiled in panic, Damiana trying frantically but in vain to rally the confused divisions.

Terrible circumstances however resulted, when the christians encountered the main Masonic line, for there was suddenly from a long impregnable position a blaze of musketry and cannons fire of the most ravaging fury, the whole line of attack was frightfully disillusioned, Hanson the main supreme christian commander was dangerously wounded, with two bullet wounds in the lung and a leg shot to pieces, and the surviving columns of the second line of assault withered to fragments, recoiled, but in order, the victorious glandelinians pressing on with the wildest yells they had ever uttered before in battle.

At their own position the main christian line which had not swept forward, made a most desperate stand, filling the whole battle field with Glandelinian dead and wounding, cutting to pieces the Glandelinian surges ten million strong, each, routing the survivors, and counter charging each time, but with the same result as the other christian forces had suffered, suffered, and with their main commander out, the christians were disconcerted, and finally had to yield to the assault of the desperate assault of the Glandelinians, and retreated first in order, and then in confusion.

Manley indeed was winning the field entirely routing the two entire christian armies for twenty miles from their own position, but the Glandelinians paid dearly for their victory, as many millions fell.

Evans following the retreating christians killed Violet and her sisters, but hundreds of times had narrow escapes from shots, that was being fired at them by the furious Glandelinians.

Finally they heard the wild thunder of horses hooves, and discovered that thousands of Glandelinian cavalry squadrons were racing toward the retreating christian troops and that their leader was the one called Boothhead, but who was Franciscana Damiana the main Glandelinian general at this section. Braggard was also among the Glandelinians and he seeing the christian girls ordered a large force of the cavalry, to follow him, and raced with might and main to over take Evans and Violet and her sisters, the Gargolians firing viv viv after after volley.

Evans saw this squadron of fierce men in regalias and whispering to the little girls suddenly swung half around on his seat, and fired, at Braggard without any dispute, bringing him down from his horse, with a so shot through the brain. His fall threw his followers into confusion, and during the commotion Evans and the little girls managed to lengthen the distance between, the men and nevertheless the Glandelinians had rapidly recovered, and being bound to avenge the death of their general Braggard, they resumed the pursuit with greater alacrity, riding their hardest to over take Evans and the little girls, but now a large force of retreating Angelinians making a rally, covered the retreat of the eight poor fugitives, giving the pursuing Glandelinians a hot reception, but nevertheless could not stop their wild progress, and it seemed evident that Evans and the little girls would be captured.

At all points the christians were retreating in confusion, and panic, the Glandelinians following furiously. General Charles Brown of Hanson's command, managed to rally a portion of his christian army, but so furious was the dreadful Glandelinian attack, that the christian troops could not stand before it, and finally broke and fled, the Glandelinians capturing many prisoners, including general Cammillia, and colonel Stanck.

General Vivian through the help of his generals tried to rally portions of his army, but before the headlong advance of the enemy, the soldiers only became panic stricken once more, and fled like frightened sheep without firing a shot.

Nevertheless general Vivian was bound to rally his force, if it even cost him his life, for if he was totally beaten in this battle, it would cost him the war itself, and the enemy would capture Gloria. He first tried to get in communication with Hanson believing him unharmed, but soon he received reports, that his great brother was seriously and dangerously wounded, that he was seriously and dangerously wounded, with three bullet wounds in his right arm instead of two and a badly mangled left leg, that half of his army was disorganized and the rest crumpled to fragments, and was being routed worse than his own. Nevertheless this did not daunt general Vivian though the fall of his brother almost made him despair and he heard heartbrokenly he was like his brother, showing a name of despair and determination and when he set his mind upon a thing he generally did it. By the most frantic efforts he with his generals, managed to draw his artillery far in advance of his retreating hordes, and lined them up then on the sloping plains of Stanck, making a perfect chain of three hundred thousand cannon, within half an hour. These were placed into a position so as to sweep the entire length of the pursuing line of the maddened foe, and then when the last gun was placed, the surging or hordes of christians came up the Angelinian cavalry in the rear of the batteries dashing among them, striving valiantly to rally them.

During this time the christians, seeing the peril of the ones they loved, beat it heart and so on, but in vain, and they were borne along in the human tide of confusion. General Vivian tried to rally them, but it was useless, and if his artillery failed to check the foe all would be lost then.

THE RESULT OF THE MURDEROUS FIRE OF ARTILLERY AND WHAT GOOD IT DID..

Surge after surge of panic stricken Angelinians, passed through and among the line of batteries, some shouting that the whole line of artillery would do no good, that the whole Glandelinian army was advancing, and finally the last of the confused columns were streaming past, and general Vivian with some uproar upraised shouted:

"Wait until you see the whites of their eyes-----"

It seemed indeed that nearly half of Manley's army was advancing in this location, and it could be seen also that these many showy columns made a fair mark for his hidden artillery, which were mostly machine guns, as the heavy guns had been abandoned in the hasty retreat. The pursuing foe came nearer and nearer, a strange peculiar haze fortunately concealing the position of the christian batteries, and finally when within three hundred yards of the artillery;

general Vivian called:

"Steady-----Steady-----They are not near enough yet-----Hold your fire."

This was obeyed without the slightest impatience, as the nearer the foe would be the greater his losses in their artillery would inflict upon his advancing lines. Nearer and nearer came the gaudy foe, the artillery officers being unable to hear some of the Glandelinian officers shout;

"Forward to victory men. We can shoot the God of those christians that he can't prevent us from beating his christian armies. Forward on to victory."

"Oh is that so, thought one of the christian artillery generals; with a curse; 'You are coming on to pay dearly for routing the christians you mean.'"

The glandelinians were now within one hundred yards, of the christians rushing on in close formation the leaders shouting;

"On to victory. Down with the christians dogs!" and so on flourishing their sabres wildly. They were now within fifty yards of the christian guns and general Vivian said;

"Get ready as quickly as you can-----fix cartridge belts-----Now steady-----wait for orders to fire."

He waited until the gray surge was within ten yards and then the glandelinians saw the deadly guns, but too late. All general Vivian did was to bring his sabre down to his side and all the guns let loose simultaneously, tearing nearly all of the glandelinian waves to pieces, heaping the slain ridges high.

The surviving glandelinians were thrown into confusion by this murderous artillery fire, so suddenly opened upon them, but nevertheless the glandelinian generals managed to rally their shattered columns, and made a wild, roaring tremendous onslaught against the batteries, but every assaulting wave was withered, officers went down by the score and the glandelinians again recoiled in confusion appalled at the frightful massacre.

It was utterly impossible to carry these guns in the face of such an annihilating fire, and seeing the disorder the retreating christian columns began to rally and add their musketry to the fire of the artillery, and the whole gray line was so frightfully ravaged, that the glandelinians in advance though not driven back was checked.

No such fortune however as yet happened to Hansons sadly depleted army. Without their main chieftain they were unable to do a thing, and General Evans himself did not know what to do. Violet and her sisters were terror stricken and begged Evans pitiously to do something to stop the fearful rout, but he could not think of a thing. The little girls turned such wistful eyes toward him, that he was touched, but what could he do? He really dreaded the consequences of this retreat more than they did, and yet he had been instructed by general Vivian not to enter the battle, under any conditions without orders. His instructions was to guard and protect the Vivian girls at all costs. But then he realized also that if the enemy, won this battle, he would place the little girls in a danger, he could not under any conditions guard them against, and then if he failed to protect them in this case what would general Vivian say? And then he did not care a rap what the consequences would be, he only thought of the little girls himself as if they were his very own daughters, for it was his respect and love for them that made him their guardian. He had started the guardian ship himself without any bodys orders, and not even under the authority of general Vivian. He raked his brain with plan after plan but could not think of anything that would bring success.

A SERIOUS CHECK

Far to the west they heard the Pop-pop-pop-pop-pop of many machineguns, but this did not encourage them any at all, and poor Violet and her sisters were almost crying. They did not know what to do about it themselves and the enemy was advancing on to -----victory! Poor Violet and her sisters were certainly confirmed now that the war was lost, that general Hansons advance to protect Alorinia was in vain.

that their happiness was gone forever, and that Angelina and Alvarina would be under the glandelinian rule. They believed also that nothing could stop the foe now, that glandelinians was victorious, that they would see life long misery at the hands of the cruel glandelinians and probably torture torture unto death. They did certainly look distressed, and Evans saw the grief, but said nothing because he knew it to be unavailing. He himself had no hopes now that the christians would win the war, and had the same disappointed feeling as the little girls and was about to give in alone altogether, but he did not speak of this to the little girls, though he feared for their safety exceedingly.

But as far as concerned general Vivians strategy made a serious check along the glandelinian front as his quarter, and Manley knew that if he could not carry those batteries, before the whole of general Vivians army rallied would be lost, and the christians would not only recover the lost ground, but sweep his armies across the Francis creek once more a total defeat which would peril his movements on Alorinia.

He was bound to capture those guns, especially by mowing down the men operating them, and for reforming his column and adding them with fresh troops made a tremendous assault of the most steady ferocity, but so horrible was the losses inflicted, that Manley was unsuccessful, the main christian force was almost rallied, and the artillery was strongly supported, and Manley now fairly unconfident of success, and felt like giving it up. As for general Vivian he felt that he had seriously blundered in taking Hansons advice in allowing Manleys armies in cross to cross the creek, and many of his officers fully believed that this was the cause of the great disaster that had occurred.

They wished now to counter charge Manleys staggered army, but general Vivian did not see it wise to do so, as one had already been made, and ended with serious disaster, and to make it worse Manleys whole entire line was fairly storming with fire. He believed it more wise to allow Manley to crush his divisions again at the artillery, and now as the bigger guns were being placed into position Manleys blazing lines were incessantly raked with a hailstorm of shrapnel, high explosives and other missiles, which gapped and tore it the whole in length of the line.

General Vivian was apprehensive of the threatening outcome for he learned the full conditions of the affairs along Hansons line, and this filled him with the fear that the battle was entirely lost, and headreared less something serious should happen to Evans and his daughters left under his charge. He decided that Evans must be located at all costs, as he firmly believed that Evans alone could have the means to save general Hansons army from a disastrous defeat. So he summoned general Lickwick Baldwin the staunch staunch friend of Violet and her sisters and when he arrived general Vivian said;

"As a proof of your friendship to me and my daughters, I have a favor I wish of you. It's a dangerous mission I'm sending you on, and you can refuse if you want. But what ask is that only you I can trust to deliver this message to your friend general Jack Evans in Hansons command and it's you I ask. Will you go?"

"Yes sir," answered Baldwin without a moments hesitation. "I just know where the retreating christians are, and probably can find him easy."

"Good I knew you would not refuse," said general Vivian with tears in his eyes and laying his hand on his shoulder.

Baldwin took the sealed envelope and rushed southwestward, reaching Hansons disordered command without encountering a single glandelinian, and it took him nearly an hour before he saw general Jack Evans and the little Vivian girls coming and immediately rushed alongside of Evans.

General Evans though superior to Baldwin's sudden command taking the offered note proceeded to read its contents, while Baldwin rode on with them waiting for Evans decision. His face turned red as he read it but never theless he was only excited. This is what he read;

Dear friend Jack Evans;
I have before requested that for the sake of my little daughters under your charge that you do not enter any actual battle, without being notified to do so, but under such serious circumstances as is now occurring, it will be necessary of me to require it of you. Hanson is dangerously wounded, his army is without a leader, and if not rallied my stand will not be successful. I request you to assume supreme command in his stead, and rally the army. Please do it quickly as longer delay is perilous.

General Vivian
Angelina

"This is a good chance to show general John Vanley what an enemy he has made out of a onetime friend. Though I thought Evans to himself: 'I will show Vanley who is the enemy!'"

Then turning to Baldwin he said:

"Really as much of the force as you can, telling them that their retreat is endangering the civilian girls. I'll do my part elsewhere, and you require my little girl friend friends to help in this also. Hurry, no time is to be lost."

WHAT HAPPENS WHEN EVANS TAKES HANSON'S PLACE IN COMMA ND..

Evans and the little girls then dashed among the retreating christian columns, and Baldwin having told him how general Vivian checked his assailants, Evans decided to try the same stunt. He dashed among the retreating artillery commanders, shouting again and again to each commander:

"Get your artillery ahead of the retreating columns. Orders of general Vivian. Dash off like mad!"

The artillery was soon stampeding on the way, Evans dashing back and forth with caviary among the men, and his encouraging words and the presence of the civilian girls who were pleading piteously soon had the effects of rallying many thousands who of course were ordered to resume the retreat in a more orderly manner, as to stand now was folly.... The little girls were among other artillery battalions, Evans quickly coming up behind, giving the commanders the same instructions, and within half an hour two miles and a half in front of the retreating christian columns, there was forming a deadly chain of cannon similar like general Vivian had originated, and the same kind of guns, though better still than general Vivian had done, the other heavier artillery was lined up far to the rear, and half of Hanson's army was already being rallied, though still retreating swiftly under orders of their commanders.

"Now then," said Evans riding up to the main commander, and showing him general Vivian's order. "He checked Vanley's columns along his front the same way, by drawing his artillery far ahead of the main retreating line, and we can do like wise. We will wait until all the christian columns stream to the rear of the batteries, and then give Vanley the hottest reception he ever got any way. I have a special grudge that I would like to pay John Vanley and I'll pay it if I get the chance."

"Oh don't shoot him," pleaded Violet. "He is mean but may change." "So will the devil change," laughed Evans. "No dearie, your wish will only be granted, if Vanley keeps himself out of my sight, for other wise I'll have a machine gun bring him down." "I don't care for one," said Jennie. "Violet don't be foolish. He deserves it the best."

"So he does," said Violet. "I would shoot him also if I had the chance. He will never repent. God don't see fit to forgive the fiend because if he did Jennie Jennie would not have recovered his sight when she offered it for her conversion. So why let the rascal escape and persecute us more and more!"

"No indeed indeed," shot back Catherine. "I have my pistols handy and if Evans don't see me when I do I'll save him the trouble."

"So will I," said Mattie. "presenting her pistol." "We are perfectly justified in killing the assassin of little children."

Vanley said nothing but her silence meant more than words, as her eyes flashed, and tears streamed down her cheeks, as she examined her own gun.

As she was the only one who had thought different at first, Violet seeing that all her sister sisters did not agree with her, said:

"All right then. I'm the same opinion. Evans riddle him with the machine gun if you get the opportunity. Otherwise we will kill him if we see the chance."

By this time almost the entire christian force was streaming to the rear but here the enemy was coming faster than they did. General Vivian's line was almost upon the batteries. General Vivian knew it, they were within a hundred feet of the batteries, when Evans saw them coming but surprisingly to him they were silent, the landelinians having seen the batteries and opening a withering storming fire.

Scores of gunners went down dead, hundreds fell wounded, horses reared and plunged, the horses of Evans and the civilian girls were killed under them, the chief general of the artillery force was killed, and for a moment there was confusion among the surviving gunners.

"Hold those guns," roared the other commanders as the landelinians sent forth another storming fire of bullets. Aim low at their waist bands, fresh gunners take the place of those fallen, not then steady now fire and give them hell."

All at once there was a roar of guns that shook the air with a terrific concussion, and the whole surgewhich had come within range had fairly withered away into dead and wounded, the other columns in the rear were appalled and panic stricken and thrown into great confusion. A sudden series of musket volleys followed the simultaneous cannon fire, the other line was rapped and torn, and the survivors becoming more panic stricken recoiled.

The noise of this firing was heard plainly where general Vivian was, he of course knowing what it meant.

The main surge of landelinians came up at this moment, led in person by general John Vanley, and arrested the confusion, general John Vanley giving orders, for the batteries to be violently assaulted.

The onslaught was terrific like a mighty shock of twenty tidal waves, on a strong breakwater, and twenty times the whole full length of each twenty-two surge were shot to pieces, and the survivors even driven back with more frightful slaughter, and one hundred generals down in killed. Who could imagine the frightful roar of salvos of so many cannons, the crash of millions of musketry, and yelling of the combatants all this time.

The din was ear-splitting and Violet and her sisters though half a mile behind the firing line had to keep their hands pressed together, tightly over their ears to keep out the frightful deafening din that fairly made their very hearts leap.

In the meantime during his twelfth assault Vanley had been arranging his own batteries, and when he made his twenty-first assault, with all his might, it was covered by a fiercer artillery fire than ever seen before, and the shock of the assault was so vehement that it was almost successful. The line along the center gave way before the pressure of the attack, but the rest of the line supported by the fire of the heavy artillery far to the rear, held its ground so finally slaughtering column after column, the landelinians attacking in seeming overwhelming numbers.

Once during the onslaught the enemy had captured the artillery but it was retaken before a shot could be fired. Vanley led this assault in person, being at the right of the attacking waves, in the region where Jack Evans was in person, but to no opportunity presented itself for Evans to get the rascal. It indeed was a frightful attack, and at times the smoke of musketry almost obscured the opposing forces who continually kept a distance of forty yards, from each other, and having closed fifteen times in frightful death struggles.

The losses on both sides were indiscriminately terrific, but still heavier on the christian side, and Evans wondered if the christian line could hold out or not. A second time in the midst of a roaring screaming inferno of death and destruction the enemy had gotten possession of the batteries, only to be driven back again by overwhelming numbers leaving walls of dead in front of the guns, and mounds of slain between and among them. This was not a battle but a massacre.

And so appalled were the landelinians that they finally recoiled and once more. But the desperation of their leaders knew no bounds, and again the attack was resumed with redoubled violence, and this time though the frightful inferno of the battle was redoubled, the foe were again successful the landelinians annihilating one quarter of the brave defenders, and driving the remainder back in confusion toward the other batteries of heavier guns, and tried six times with the fury of utmost desperation and determination, to capture these, but these guns, ploughed twenty miles gaps in the attacking landelinian columns.

and the Angelinians a Angelinian reinforcements taking to their pikes and bayonets closed with the Glandelinians and fought a desperate battle of fury and rage, so doing effect work while the Christian cavalry, crashed or crashed upon the assailants like an avalanche driving them back once more with exorbitant loss, recapturing the other batteries, and followed them until ordered to recoil by their leaders.

At this point Manley had lost nearly half of his attacking force, and appalled over his frightful loss he decided to fall back and wait until the final issue came between general Vivian, and general Johnston Jacken Manley.

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS, LITTLE ANGELS OF MERCY.....

If his father general Johnston Jacken Manley won again, they would drive at Jack Evans like a wedge, and keep driving until he won. During the full Violet and her sisters came back to where they knew general Jack Evans to be, watching the thousands of men carrying the wounded to the rear, for and friend alike, and erecting human breastworks of the dead of both sides. The wounded however were twenty to one of the dead, many having terrible shell wounds.

They could hear the distant firing along general Vivian's lines, and wondered how it was turning out, and was it as cruel as the part raging along general Johnston's lines. He did that best to ease the sufferings of the wounded soldiers, whether he wore the purple or the gray, and surprising as it was received heartily the news from both. Scores of wounded Glandelinians had horrible bayonet wounds, a good deal of the fighting having been with the bayonet, the machine guns at times having been inactive, when at such close quarters, but these Glandelinians were the better sect among the Omarians, and regarded the Vivian girls as little angels of mercy, and told them to keep out of reach of general Johnston Manley under any conditions for a reward, telling them that the reason general Manley attacked so furiously, was to crush Evans and destroy them. When all the wounded that could be gotten inside the firing line was brought to the rear, as outside no one could go, on account of Manley's continual drum-drum-drum fire, which made the region a million times more dangerous than "No Man's Land," then they covered a region of nearly forty miles in length in a perfect sea of human suffering.

The purple of course were separated from the gray, but from the Angelinians from the wounded of both sides received the same equal care, to which many thousands of the better Glandelinians were grateful and really hoped their benefactors success.

Violet and her sisters looked closely among the wounded Glandelinians for somebody they thought they might know, but all the faces were strange to the little girl girls, they having expected to see Boothhead, as they had heard he had fallen in the Christian lines in their location.

But fortunately the rumors were false for he had not taken any part in this attack, as he had not been commanded to do so. He of course was ignorant of the immediate presence of the Vivian girls, but during a lull he got his tent. Manley rode up to his tent and said:

"General Francisanna I have no doubt that you know the Vivian girls and have had serious trouble with them before the war. I've offered a great reward for their capture or destruction, and if you wish to claim the reward you may do so. Catch them and you will get the reward."

Boothhead he hesitated for a few minutes and then said:

"I don't know about that, your excellency," said general Francisanna. "I tied those very Vivian girls on the closest edge of a treacherous geyser intending to lure them to perish in a miserable manner. However they got loose and escaped, and in perceiving they slipped and fell down the geyser. And to think of it it was near the time to a spout too. They could have escaped too, and let me perish at will, but the little girls did not do so, and rescued me not a moment too soon. I asked forgiveness, and promised not to molest them again. And I must keep my promise. I promise come what will. And I'm sure if you was in my place you would be grateful too."

"Be it as you wish then," said Johnston Jacken Manley. "As for me I will not say anything of the matter, as this was only a request of my son."

And he rode back to his own concentration point, and watched the firing of his guns and long lines of musketry. He really wished to lay his hands on the little girls, but no one would undertake the task of going within the Christian lines to get the little girls, especially as conditions were now. He knew of his dangerous adversary Jack Evans, who could guard the little saintly children almost as powerfully as their real guardian angel, and if he could only get him out of the way, all would be well.

For an hour he waited for news from the main army assaulting general Vivian, but though news gradually came, it was only that general Vivian was still standing his ground, and slaughtering his son's army frightfully. There was no pleasant news anywhere, it was only failure, failure, failure. He did not think it wise to resume the assault against the Christian line now under general Jack Evans, especially as his generals disagreed of it but yet he did not dare to retreat without his son's orders, and he tried various maneuvers to cause the Christians to attack, which finally, and to his sorrow he succeeded in doing, the Angelinians making a more fearful assault than ever seen before in battle against his entire line. The attack was even more terrific than Manley had expected it to be, but nevertheless he believed that if he could inflict severe losses, upon the Christians he could then be able to repulse them, resume his own assault and win the battle entirely to a finish. But he reckoned without the host. Having drawn his forces into the attack much against his will and been having been unable to restrain his men, general Jack Evans flew into a rage against general Manley, and decided to play a real childish prank, so kiddish, that Manley was flabbergasted. Within half an hour both flanks of Manley's line was completely turned, his main line was severely cut up, and thrown into confusion, and the survivors began streaming back toward the rear south in a fearful rout, the Christians gradually but successfully after series of sanguinary engagements, recovered all the ground they lost, retaking their two lines of works, which had been abandoned during the fearful fight in which general Johnston Vivian had been wounded, and Manley's works also.

It was a frightful disaster for Manley's army, which had been routed like the French army at Waterloo, and even general Boothhead, who tried to cover general Manley's retreat, and suffered fearful losses, before the long series of Christian onslaughts forced him to yield also.

The plains and woods though three hours passed, were still enshrouded by the thick smoke of the recent firing, which had been more severe than before.

Manley tried frantically to retake his lost position, finally succeeding, after his whole line for three hours was fearfully soothed and soothed, the smitten and broken fragments pressing the Christians slowly back, but only as far as their own works, which was as yet impossible for Manley to recapture in his frightful condition.

His whole army was frightfully deformed and deformed, and portions disillusioned by losses, and it took a four hours lull to regather them. But just now Jacken Manley attacked no more, and not a gun had remained to his army, the Christians capturing every battery he had, even the guns they had seized Manley's lines of works, when retreating to their own works. The Christians now had all the artillery, Manley had hardly a field piece. It was the greatest loss in cannon the Glandelinian army had ever suffered before, and the greatest and most surprising accomplishment the Christians had ever effected before. This proved to the two haughty Manley what an adversary Evans was when aroused. Evans was surprised over the happening himself. Johnston Manley was now completely helpless, his army was in a jeopardized condition, and should Evans resume the attack with the same hellish fur as before, all would be lost.

He sent an immediate appeal to his son stating that if he received no help he might as well consider himself beaten, for he himself would retreat without further resistance. Evans himself immediately wrote to general Vivian the following, which reached him through the means of a messenger:

"Your excellency general Vivian I, still laughing as I write this to you. I have rallied Hanson's army, repulsed general Manley, inflicting great losses by the wholesale, countercharge and crushed Manley to fragments, and sweeping his army far beyond his own works, which he finally retook after sanguinary slaughter. But general Manley is without a single cannon as we have every Glandelinian battery in our possession, besides retaking our own. Manley is helpless and as soon as I reform my forces I shall immediately resume the attack, and either capture, or rout him.

JACK EVANS
GUARDIAN OF THE VIVIAN GIRLS"

General Vivian did not laugh however when he read this, but nevertheless took it for granted, that Evans had done a great deal more than expected and if the battle was won he must get his reward. So he sent back Baldwin with an immediate answer:

GENERAL JACK EVANS:
Your excellent success will through my means bring you the credit of the victory if the battle is won, so I advise you to do as I command, and you will come off well. Do not delay in your attack upon Manley, and if the battle is won I'll do my best to get you a higher commission, and the full honor of the great and Holy nation/Angelina.
YOUR FRENCH FRIEND
GENERAL VIVIAN...."

Evans indeed thought it very imprudent to delay the attack longer than necessary, and only a lull ensued in which time was taken to reform the christian line, and before he least expected it, Manley saw large columns of Abissinians swarming forward once more to attack his lines. Despite being without the assistance of his artillery, Manley for a long time managed to give serious and successful resistance but the onslaughts were so continuous that finally the Glandelinian columns broke and fled abandoning their works, and nightfall closed the scene of the frightful carnage.

All the rest of that day the other Manley had continued his assaults against general Vivian's line throwing forward a hundred divisions per hour, and as fast as these divisions were crushed and mangled, and driven back in confusion, another hundred would be driven forward to the assault, but only met with terrific dislusion, and heavy losses in generals.

The slaughter was merciless, but only when ten times general John Manley, threw hundreds of divisions forward to the attack, and see them either reel back in fragments or be wiped out, did he abandon the attack. Then general Vivian's whole line like an avalanche crashed upon Manley's disordered armies, and within three hours, had recaptured one half of their lost ground, where the enemy then rallied, and poured the most terrific fire of the whole war upon the christian assailants.

Put this check was only a momentary one. General Vivian's whole series of batteries were pounding Manley's lines, inflicting killing and maiming losses and finally another general onslaught caused the withdrawal of Manley's army, general Vivian being enabled to make a final advance and retake his works, which had been abandoned by the hasty withdrawal of his troops. The action had cleared along this point more assailing Glandelinian troops than seen before in battle within such a short space of time, though of course the action had ceased several hours sooner, than Hanson's lines, but here general John Manley still retained his works.

Indeed this had been a most sanguinary and terrible battle, of the most frightful fury, and now where was that mighty Glandelinian band, who so vauntingly swore that despite the aid of the good God, that the havoc of war, and the battle's confusion, a come and country, should be left to Angelina no more! Their oceans of blood had been washed out, with their foul footsteps pollution, and the surviving fragments in prayer, once so haughty and defiant of God was now in dread silent repose.

The main chieftain however, still had a fresh force in reserve to equal general Vivian's despite his father losing three quarters of his own army, in killed, wounded, and captured, but nevertheless both the two GREAT Glandelinian generals had a strange fear of general Jack Evans, alone who was responsible entirely for the sweeping christian victory, and were a least he to resume the attack on the morrow.

It was a stinging blow the two Manleys had received a crushing blow after having routed both the christian armies for twenty miles, and then have this disastrous chance come so suddenly, and the christian losses one to their twenty. It was horrible to think of and Johnston Manley had almost fainted when the defeat occurred.

EVANS WITH VIOLET AND HER SISTERS VISITED GENERAL HANSON HANSON..

The losses of the christians under K Jack Evans alone was far greater than Johnston Manley's, on account of the sweeping devastation caused by the annihilating Glandelinian fire, during Hanson's terrific assault, but nevertheless the whole christian loss was one to John Manley's twenty, in the whole Glandelinian army combined. Hanson however though dangerously wounded, was only injured severely enough, to put him out of service for a certain time, and that evening Evans inquired of his whereabouts and went with Violet and her sisters to see how he was.

They found him lying peacefully, in one of the general hospital tents, congratulating a group of officers around him for the victory that had been won. They all turned their heads as Evans and the little girls came in, Evans halting abruptly, and saluting the little girls going the same.

"Here is general Jack Evans now," said general Charles Brown.
"He is the one who deserves the honor. He took command of your forces while they were in confusion, rallied them and won a great victory. He led us three times against Manley in the face of the hottest fire, and routed him three times."

Evans had by this time approached the tent, motioning the generals aside, and Hanson said that general Evans was worthy of a extremely high commission, and that he would see that general Vivian would give it to him. Violet and her sisters were joyful to learn that he would be able to resume command about two months, and that his injuries were severe but not mortal. While they were in the tent it started to rain outside in sheets to torrents, and as Evans and the little girls had to remain where they were, until the rainstorm stepped. While remaining there Evans told the whole story of how he came to assume command and defeat the enemy so terribly.

"It is probable that the two Manleys may resume the battle tomorrow, but just the same I believe we can thrash him a gain if they dare to resume the fight," said Evans. But general you have such a strong overwhelming force. How came you to be wounded, and your army three times the size of Manley's force so disastrously beaten before I rallied it?"

"Knowing my brother to be in severe action, and waiting four hours for an attack which did not come, I attacked myself and not intended." Said general Hanson. "We advanced across Zoo Res McAllister Run, and suddenly we were half surrounded by an inferno of H Glandelinian cannon and musketry. The region became windrowed with my dead and dying, but I managed to rush my troops through with terrible violence, and some near forcing the enemy's line when a shell killed my horse, and put me in this condition while a storm of bullets flew about me several of which hit me. I fell throw my comrades into confusion, and their lines being broken by a most gallant onslaught of musketry and cannon fire, they retreated in a panic, several cowardly men leaping out of the zone of danger though pursued for three miles. My fall alone a great reason of this confusion you found my army in."

"Otherwise you would have been successful right then and there, despite running into the great ambush of general?"

"Yes," Exclaimed Hanson. "That is what would have happened. It was really an unexpected occurrence."

"Well we have won now," Said general Kindernine. "And on account of your general Evans."

"Well I did it especially for poor Violet and her sisters. If the foeh had won they would have succeeded in capturing and assassinating the little girls even if they had to annihilate the christian army to do so. But they didn't."

Violet and her sisters alone did not know that general Evans had caused the defeat of the ferocious Glandelinians, until they overheard the conversation between Hanson and Evans, and then they were around Evans in a moment.

"Oh Evans how wonderful," Cried Violet. "To think it was you who won the battle and before you told us you were unable to do anything."

"Well when I malloved to go into battle, there was nothing that I can't do," Said Evans. "I'll give you Jennie dear, a nice deck of gold Rosary Beads if you will count and tell your uncle exactly y exactly how many of the enemy's guns I caused Hanson's army to capture."

"I can't tell how many guns there they are," Said Jennie. "But I have heard that that Manley lost every piece of artillery he had, and nearly over three quarters of his army. But I did not know it was you who caused it."

"You made the exact statement," Laughed Evans, and handing her and her sisters each a large orange besides the Rosary Beads. "I did not mean that you should figure in numbers, and don't as yet know how many they were in numbers myself. But to be familiar according to the statement of many generals who wrote to be about it, that all the artillery they captured added up, makes three hundred thousand guns in our possession. Some haul I'll tell you."

"And further than that," Laughed general Buster Johnston. "During our morning's defeat we lost nearly every piece of our own artillery. To recapture all our own, besides all our lost ground, the entire line of the enemy's works, dissilusioning three quarters of his army, and capturing all his guns, is some feat I'll tell you. And it was you Jack who caused it. And I can still laugh when I remember the rout of the gray forces."

"That was the same with me," Said Evans. "If an swarm of racing men were pursued by a cloud of honey bees out of thousands of great hives, they could never have outdone those Glandelinians in running. They fled as if all the evil spirits were after them with a storm of fiery darts."

When the next morning, John Manley's generals shrank from carrying out a plan, which would cost millions of more lives, saying "We are soldiers not butchers," general Meckensia rose at the war council and said:

"Your excellency and all highest, I will take full responsibility of the affair. Never mind the cost, never mind the lives. On my head be it. I'll carry out the plans of retaking the lost guns at all costs."

This was the plan of the two main Manleys as the reserves were brought up with the instructions to recapture the batteries they had lost with all costs. General Johnston Manley himself really lenthed out to attempt this foolhardy task, but never theless he was just as bound to recapture those guns as his son, no matter what the cost.

It was also general John Manley's intention now to have his father to make any assault against general Vivian but also to concentrate possible the whole Glandelinian army against general Jack Evans with the support of his own main batteries which alone had escaped capture, which he had during the night sent to the support of his father General Johnston Jackson.

Manley. All these plans had been carried out during the night, between artillery duels at intervals, and the next morning scouts reported to general Roswell Buster Johnston that John Manley's whole army seemed to be supporting Johnston Manley's shattered army. Roome became alarmed but nevertheless he reported the case to Evans who was with the little girls at the time. They were horrified at the news for it meant that there would be a horrible massacre. If there are born fools with dead brains the two Manleys seemed to belong to that class. Evans was however quite apprehensive and decided to get advice from general Vivian sending a messenger immediately, and then was surprised by the news that the christians under Vivian had licked the Glandelinians at the battle of Glandelinia capturing the whole of Frank Manley's army which had surrendered. Soon the messenger returned with this report, which Evans read to himself and then to these generals:

MY FRIEND GENERAL JACK EVANS:

I expected this movement right along since last night. My scouts had reported queer changes taking place within Manley's lines. If they attack don't hesitate to use all the batteries freely and I'm already sending heavy reinforcements to you your support, and will bring the rest of my army against Manley's soon as I get the remainder on the march. We will let the two Manleys know what fools they are."

YOUR FRIEND GENERAL VIVIAN"

Evans never mentioned anything about the note to any of his main generals, but immediately gave instructions that they were to let the Assaults have all the gall and wormwood they wanted when the assault began. Through some means however Manley's assault was delayed or seemed to be delayed, but nevertheless wary Evans was on the lookout for any tricks of Manley's for he knew that the sly fox would attempt to any trick to win a campaignary battle like this one. Roswell Buster Johnston had removed Violet and her sisters from the immediate region to keep them out of the zone of danger, and at ten o'clock the assault came with redoubled fury compared to the assault of the day before, Manley suddenly massing a vast flood of Glandelinian and Gargolinn troops against the christian lines. It would not be any use for us to try to tell how the christian batteries roared, and the musketry crashed and rattled, but after the first repulse there were many dead and wounded Glandelinian soldiers that you could have covered the whole of Lincoln Park with them like a thick carpet, and yet there would be sons of them left. Johnston Manley was severely wounded, Meckensia was killed, and the surviving generals were horrified at the horrible butchery.

The most massive Glandelinian columns that John Manley could dare get together was again thrown against the batteries with twice greater fury, the attack being so vigorous that flood of men swarmed among the guns, only to be cut down and crushed. Again and again, and still still again, the desperate essay was repeated. Only with the same horrible result. It seemed as if the end of the world had come, every range of hills in that immediate region seemed as in other battles, to be in violent eruption from the frightful echoes of the artillery and storm, and finally when it lulled, nature itself seemed to have died, so terrible was the destruction.

During the next desperate essay Manley threw hundreds of monstrous waves against the christian lines repeatedly, the whole world seemed to wither into chaos and destruction, and during the frightful hell of carnage general Roswell Buster Johnston saw the fatally wounding of general Charles Brown, Kindernine was wounded, severely, than Roswell W. Buster Johnston was disabled, and ten other christian generals were killed.

The essay was almost successful when the remainder of general Vivian's army arrived, the hundreds of assaultive waves were torn to fragments, by a dangerous fire, and the survivors recoiled pell-mell---the whole christian line surging forward, capturing another quarter of Manley's army and totally routing the remainder toward their works.

The battle again lulled, and yet Manley refused to acknowledge himself beaten. He then, his generals hastily gathering the small remainder of the still retreating troops and hastily withdrew them to cover of their own works pursued for a certain distance by the exultant christians.

THE STRUGGLE CONTINUES. THE DEATH OF HANGDELINIA.

For an hour the confused portions of Manley's recent attacking columns had continued their retreat, despite the facts that his main army was increasing from the immense forces arriving, and which was under Ambrose Fuller.... General Vivian and his various other commanders immediately laid siege to general Johnston Jackson Manley's right wing which had become separated, Evans forces which having started later had made a continual advance since morning through beautiful forests, jungles, through gorges, the low hills through gorges, through valleys, swamps, on the low hills, the little girls seeing much of the Angelinian country through which they now passed.

The inhabitants of the town the christians under Evans passed through, though in Angelinia was fully inhabited by Glandelinians, but nevertheless they were against the butchery committed by their relations, and sided fully for the christian cause and cheered them wildly as the Angelinian soldiers passed through.

Violet and her sister admired the beauty of the Angelinian hills, and mountain fields, tropical woods and jungles, and wide grassy plains over and through which the christians advanced....

For John Manley, it seemed as if the war was completely lost, and when when one quarter of his father's army was hemmed in by the christians he was apprehensive. The officers in the surrounded wing demanded that general Hangdelinia surrender before the christians desolate their columns. They declared it was his fault because of his downfall, and that to save the army at this point from destruction, he must surrender to general Vivian and sue for peace.

Hard pressed by his own officers who even threatened an uprising general Hangdelinia demanded of general Vivian what conditions would be accepted if he surrendered. General Vivian however answered the same way as general Grant did at Fort Donaldson, and Hangdelinia was still more apprehensive.

General Manley himself decided to try once more to strike general Vivian to save his father's surrounded right wing, and to prevent Hangdelinia from surrendering in that humiliating fashion. During the dull of the conflict he sent many scouts out to find the christians, but they reported there was outnumbered ten to one and that more christians were coming under general Evans, probably a portion of the main army which had remained further behind during the first hour of battle to that morning.

General Johnston himself on account of one wing being trapped was afraid to attack the powerful army now pressing upon him, and general Hangdelinia demanded that general Vivian accept his surrender on several conditions, and not also inhuman and rude to a fallen leader, whom at his mercy. He even stated he that all done by his armies would be atoned for, but again general Vivian shot back by writing:

"I'll accept no conditions whatever. You've simply got to surrender that is all and when in my possession I'll do with you as I like. There will be no terms, as you will pay dearly for the massacre of children, the disgraceful use of the religious, and the ruining of the Angelinian towns. If you are wise you will rise your hands and let your army slip in front of your eyes."

The two Manleys himself seeing that they could not save the surrounded wing unless by desperately attacking general Vivian, they decided that the best plan was to make an assault on the entire christian line at once with the entire force, to drive the assault with all their might, and break it at all costs. He did his best to quiet the soldiers in the surrounded wing, telling them by wireless the fact that he they could now lick general Vivian easily. Indeed he was now confident that he and his father could worse general Vivian if he only tried, but then he thought it best to sent his secret service men to find out the location of the Vivian Girls, and when known that afternoon he would order the force of the attack in that quarter, capture the Vivian Girls, and order General Vivian to retreat back into D Calvernia to save his daughters from massacre, and then after general Vivian obeyed, he would kill him anyway.

So at nine o'clock in the morning before the full the secret men were sent off in large bodies, adding hundreds of boyscouts, but general Starring on the christian side then spying on Manley and his army had heard the whole plan, and in going toward the christian lines to give the warning came in contact with a party of the military police, who supposed him to be one of the men of a separate scouting party as also, and he had a quick question to the whereabouts of Violet and her sisters. Of course he did not know, did not want them to know, and did not care to betray no one to these rascally assassins.

He decided that these were some of Manley's spies and immediately answered:

"I have not seen them, though I'm looking for them as well as you men. Haven't you found them yet?"

He then learned from the men they were trying to locate Violet and her sisters, and pretended to be a scout, that the Vivian girls were just ahead of a party; knew the way their guardian, and that even during an attack to capture them was impossible, as putting an element through a key-hole.

The Glandelinians laughed also, and said that they believed him, but that nevertheless that it was their orders to do so, that Manley would win a hand at least the location of the Vivian girls must be discovered, and that it was up to Manley to do what he can.

So as soon as these Glandelinians passed on, general Starring wondered what to do. He knew that if poor Violet and her sisters were not warned, Manley would be successful this time, in finding their location, and succeed in carrying out his plans. He decided to prove his friendship, by either warning them or Evans. He slipped toward the christian lines, and coming within sight of it saw three very pretty little girls of dazzling beauty, riding toward his locality on horseback. He had never seen them before but nevertheless as he could not understand of seeing other children riding horses so well he knew they must be the little girls.

He rode under cover of a large tree, and waited for the appearance of the little girls, who suddenly turned the head in the road, halting abruptly when they saw him.

"Don't any of you, little girls or either your other sisters, proceed any further." He said warningly as they halted. "And I'm playing no jokes, but warning you that it is dangerous to proceed."

"Warning us?" Said one of the little girls who was Jennie. "What is wrong?"

"Glandelinians are moving all over the region to locate you little girls, so as to capture you if possible, when Manley makes his attack. I have met one of the searching parties."

"That is what Manley has always been doing." Said Catherine. "But we will look out for the scouts, and go back to the lines as well. But tell us what does Manley intend to do?"

"Capture you little girls."

"And after he captures us?"

"He is a more treacherous scoundrel than I ever believed him to be."

Said general Starring. "From what I heard when spying, and from the men in one of the searching parties whom I conversed with, I learned that Manley intends to capture you little girls, and when in his possession will send a warning to general Vivian that if he does not withdraw from the siege of the wing, he will kill you little girls after torturing you as far as he sees fit." But he intends to do it whether general Vivian abandons the siege of the surrounded army or not. So I thought I would warn you little girls before it is too late."

"On the feast that he is and after all our prayers and hardships were offered up to God for his conversion." Said Mattie hurrying into tears. "I knew John Manley was mean but I never could believe he was so treacherous, and after we crying our eyes out for his soul."

"To bad----to bad." Said Starring. "Johnston" only has put him up to it. It is both of the Manleys that you little girls must lookout for."
 "I'm very glad that you told us." Said Catherine. "And I will see that papa will promote you for this. You may come with us into the lines. You have done us a sw service so prohibit saved us from being murdered by those assassins, and if he does not promote you we will consider it an act of ingratitude."

Starring felt that his heart was bursting for love of these little girls who led him through the lines, coming suddenly upon Violet, Jennie sister Joice, Daisy and Angelina who were riding through a company street.

"Did you capture that Glandelinian ally yourselves?" Asked Violet with a surprise.

"No, and neither will he be a prisoner." Said Jennie. "He is General Starring who warned us that we were about to be ambled upon by the Glandelinians, and we are going to report the affair to papa."

"Is that so?" Said Daisy coming from a tent she had just entered, followed by Evans and Gertrude Angelina.

Starring told them the story in short detail and Evans was full of furious.

"Those searching parties will know nothing about their whereabouts." He muttered to himself. He refused to go with them in to on this occasion, stating that he will make it hot for those military police, and galloping to his lines he detailed fourteen companies, separating each, and formed deadly ambushes for the searching parties. Violet and her sisters rode up to where general Vivian was directing the placing of a new battery, finding him with a group of generals, and when at their request the officers were dismissed, the little girls told all that Starring had mentioned, leaving out nothing.

General Vivian looked long at Starring and said:

"How many Glandelinians have been sent?"

"That your excellency I could not state for exact numbers. But by the looks of things there must be thousands."

"Who is leading them?"

General Rooster."

"General who?"

"General Rooster Flunglam is what they call him."

"They ought to cut his head off and prepare him for dinner."

Laughed Baldwin who remained. "Those Glandelinian generals certainly do have funny names."

"Well what ever his name is this is a serious matter." Said general Vivian grimly. "According to this general's testimony the two Manleys are endeavoring to find the location of my daughters, attack that point with all his forces their force, and kill them whether I abandon the siege of Johnston Manleys right wing or not, after trying to get me away by his wily threats. That John Manley is as wily and as treacherous as the king of the devils himself, but nevertheless I'll prove that St Michael and Lucifer will have the game all played over again, and that Lucifer will be beaten again. I'll leave the Vivian girls here where they are, but let Manley dare to attack this quarter and I'll slaughter his very legions of men. My two wings on the right and left are well protected by steep hills, and can afford to hold off armies ten times the size of theirs without the support of a single cannon. So all the artillery will be made to support the center at which this treacherous attack will come."

"I'll see to the artillery." Said general Baldwin arising, and he remounted his horse and rode off. General Vivian called his generals back, gave each one instructions, and they left one by one.

"As Evans is a devil of a fighter put him in main command of the center of the christian line." Advised general Starring.

"He has command of it." Said general Vivian. "And I have sent some of the officers to him with special instructions. I'll prove to Manley that he is playing with a volcanic furnace."

Then adding he said

"There is the rascally Starring boy and his companions who waylaid him."

"They are with one of the searching parties your excellency. You will be doing me and your little daughters a great favor to get them recaptured."

"Well." Said General Vivian. "He and his companions have committed several errors for their treatment of the little girls, without any reason. I'll promote you to major general if you will sacrifice your time while on your short for furlough by tricking those lads away, and lead them into a trap, and cause their capture. Do this and I'll be a greater friend to you than ever."

"You are welcome to them any time you mention." Answered Starring.

"And it will be no sacrifice. I'll go out find the party they are in, tell them that I'm a bitter enemy of Violet and her sisters, tell them that I know where to find them, and lead them into one of the traps Evans has set for those searching parties. I may risk my life doing this for I may get shot in the ambush. If not I'll tell you how it came out."

"Do so." Said general Vivian. And Starring bidding good bye to the little girls went off on his mission.....

STARRING'S REVENGE.....

Starring escorted through the picked lines by Violet and her sisters, soon had left the christian lines far behind, and riding around for a time soon saw a long surge of Gargolians approaching. They seemed countless in number, the sudden terrific roar of heavy firing was heard far off to his left. He left and placing his glasses to his eyes he surveyed the approaching troops, and discovered that it was not a searching party, but really a full stream of advancing Glandelinian cavalry.

Where they were going he could not make out, but nevertheless there was nothing important about them, as Starring and his two companions were not with them, so he hastily left the region, continuing his search for Starring and his two companions. He finally came upon a large column of Glandelinians among which were the three boys. The column halted at his approach, one of the officers demanding:

"Well stranger have you seen any of the children called the Vivian girls?"

"Yes I have and can easily lead you to them." Said Starring. "I got inside the christian lines and pretending to be their friends discovered their whereabouts. I'll lead you there."

As Starring wheeled his horse the lieutenant gave the order "Forward" And the whole column followed the treacherous christian enemy. They had gone on galloping for half an hour, when reaching the main road hundreds of redcoats suddenly darted out from behind trees and rocks, Gertrude Angelina seeming to be the leader of the surprise party.

"Surrender ye varmints." Yelled one of the redcoat lieutenants furiously. "Or we will cut you down like dogs. You'll not find the Vivian girls, but we will be glad to show you our camp prisoners."

But these Glandelinians at first would not surrender, but immediately drew their sabres and dashed at their christians, and in the confusion of the battle which raged fiercely general Starring as escaped out of the mass waving to Gertrude to follow him, which she did:

"How did you manage this so cleverly?" Shouted. "We heard your promise to general Vivian, but I never expected you to lead a whole column into the trap. I expected only Starring and his two companions."

"Well I thought there there would be one searching party less." He answered seeing now that the remainder of the Glandelinians were surrendering when seeing that the fighting against such tremendous odds was useless. The three boys had endeavored to get away fighting as furiously as any of the graycoated soldiers, but were severely injured in the melee, and indeed general Starring had done his work well paying the three bad boys well for their sacrilegious treatment of poor Violet and her sisters. However the three boys were only severely wounded and that night general Vivian had seen them and promised forgiveness if they would repent. One of the Glandelinian officers in the searching party that had run into the ambush was a good catholic and before he died he was repentant of his deeds, gained Starring's friendship and forgiveness, and also the forgiveness of the great christian general and the little girl girls.....

He died after relieving the last Sacraments, the little girls praying for him until the last, as well as did general Vivian and Starring. General Vivian had not wished that the poor lads should be so severely wounded, but it happened, it was the fortunes of war, as the reckless Glandelinians trying to fight their way out of the trap into which they had fallen, had been utterly responsible for it.

GENERAL MANLEY SUGGESTS INLOCATING
THE WHEREABOUTS OF THE VIVIAN GIRLS.
THE ATTACK ATTACK.

However despite the vigilance of 604 of the Angelinians, and the ambushes formed by Jack Evans, the scouts succeeded in locating the point where the little girls were, and reported the case to Manley. Manley believed that he saw his chance, and decided to make his intended attack.

He had been cautioned by his officers however to be careful for they had learned that general Vivian was concentrating heavily on the center with artillery and infantry, and it so seemed as if the Christians were preparing to make an attack on themselves.

By these reports Manley became alarmed, and kept scouting parties out incessantly, watching the movements of the Christians, and learn what was going on.

They came back with the report that general Vivian must be in knowledge of his intentions to attack to capture the Vivian girls, as the Christian Christians are concentrating nearly all of their artillery on their main center, and strengthening their works.

They also reported that outer works were under construction, and that other works besides this far in advance was also under construction, which looked very suspicious to them.

"Somebody must have spied on my army and learned my intentions too soon damn it," snarled Manley in a sudden rage. "I had heard also that some treacherous Angelinian had led one of my searching parties into a trap and that many were slaughtered, and the rest captured. I suspect that Christian general called Gerald Starring, though I cannot confirm my suspicions."

Nevertheless despite all this Manley decided to attack anyway, and at any risk, and lick his enemy anyway. He however decided to draw all his artillery to the center to support the great driving onslaught he was to make in the efforts to capture poor Viola and her sisters. He was sure of success, for he himself had the opinion:

"Where there's a will, there's a way."

It took him two hours to get his artillery all concentrated upon his own center, and then still for some strange reason he did not attack the Christian line. Another hour however the attack came, eighty million firearms, being fired in a few minutes at a time, mingled with the roar of eight hundred thousand cannon on the Christian side, and seven hundred guns on the side of the enemy, which made a terrific din that shook the city of Calverine three hundred miles away, and as eighty thousand cannon on the enemy side blew up all at once the opposing sides were shocked from the frightful crash.

Manley's whole center fell heavily upon general Vivian's right, the conflict becoming more cruel and sanguinary, the fury of the battle gradually increasing.

The Angelinians held their positions against the fiercest assault. Thousands of brigades, and scores of thousands of divisions, were thrown against the Christian line under general Jack Evans, with the most awful force, and horrible fury, and during the marvelous and most cruel sanguinary conflict, every one of these brigades were thrown back crushed and mangled, with every column shot to pieces.

The attack indeed had been exceedingly terrific. The whole Glandelinian center had assailed the Christian line with irresistible fury for twelve hours, attacking with the most greatest energy, but all of the Glandelinian divisions were hurled back horribly cut up, and pressed back, as the Christians countercharged in overwhelming numbers, all of the Glandelinian divisions being driven back, mangled and be the bloodied, with their millions of fallen paving the fields.

All of the main gray line was dreadfully shattered by the collision. Phelan Jackson on the side of the foe was killed. Bicknell

Hanson was slain by a burning shell, Bicknell Penlign's arm army was crushed to fragments during the fearful onslaught and he himself was killed. So furious had been this conflict, that all of the volcanoes on this earth seemed to blow up in usual eruption, the earth seemed to open her mouth in damming fury, cannon flashes were a hundred times worse than lightning, the heavens seemed to split in twain, and fall down in avalanches of fire and explosions, the earth for scores of miles seemed to whirl upwards in shreds, the whole world of men and earth itself seemed to blaze and hurtle through the air, amid the crash and maddening uproar.

The gray line would reel backwards, millions going down only to lunge forward again with and main, only to be slaughtered and driven back in oceans of blood.

Broken by his bitter defeat Manley decided to leave the regions of Francis Creek and if he still retained any hopes of making another stand it must have vanished, when he discovered the city near by in flames, that the Christian pursuers were furious, and that many of his old officers had turned sourly against him as a commander who had utterly lost his power to win victories. But to elude general Vivian just now seemed out of the question, and so he managed during his desperate attack to extract the right wing of his fathers out of the encircling Christian armies.

THE SERIES OF OTHER GREAT BATTLES.....

Simultaneously to the beginning of the year on September 1th 1915 Christian armies were driving against the other nine Glandelinian armies under Mayford, Logan, Tenebre, Flapper, Frankford, Henning, Franklin, Batteria and Laughington Jennings. All brothers commanding separate armies.

Mayford on July 1th whipped Bavaria at the frightful battle of Atlanta, but two weeks later on July 15th was beaten himself at Caroline Bethel, with frightful loss. Logan and Tenebre, on the 24th simultaneously were successful against the Christians in the two battles of Mayflower, and Candleflux, but Tenebre on the ninth of August was repulsed at the sanguinary battle of Madge Evans, and again on the fourth of August won the fearful battle of H Graeb Greenburg, but payed with the loss of a leg for his victory. Flapper on August 14--24th was victorious at Lexington and Torrington, but was mortally wounded at the battle of Protestia September 1th in which 10,000,000 fell on both sides singly.

General Francis Hennings Christians won this battle. Flapper and Frankford were worsted at Abram and Yourke's, on August 4th simultaneously and at Schloeder a August 15--17th after mortal combat with general Zee Rae Logganias Christian army for three days was beaten but on September ninth in the engagement with Stanck's Abbeinnians under Bicknell Logan one of his generals blundered, and during the sanguinary battle of Padula which raged two days his army was cut to pieces and routed for three hundred miles. None of these Glandelinian generals fought any worse battle than Henning did.

Henning being worsted June 1th at Greenland Junction, repulsed at Pittsburg Landing, on June 3th after a four days engagement stood his ground June 7th and fought a terrible battle at Daisy Run July 3--4th against general McWhirther's Christians army. It was a battle worse than Francis Creek and so manfully did he hold out that McWhirther was only too glad to withdraw from the horrible slaughter. Franklin was victorious at Cubanias July 12th, Batteria was also victorious at Stanck, June 14th, but worsted at Collyer on the fifth of July and vanquished with losses prohibited to be told, at Tenebre, on August 15th. He however was more successful at Catherine Lee, and Jennings Lee. September 1th and 25th. Daughtington bent Greenburgs army on June 19th at Grove, and again bent him July 1-16th-24th at Nellie and Orenia, and successfully routed Greenburgs army after a severe engagement at Aronburg August 13th-15th. No further engagements were known since then except the battle of Herberian, with general Vivian and Manly July 1th 5th. Despite his defeat at Herberian Manley was still very obstinate and as long as he knew that Calvernia was still full of Glandelinian armies, and as long as his assisting nine generals were able to win victories, he was determined to rather risk death than allow general Vivian to drive him a step farther. He had his hopes that at Vivian Wickey could be retaken and the islanders well, but he hoped against hope. He felt very bitter over his bloody repulse at the battle of Francis creek, and so was determined to secure Violet and her sisters some other way. He decided to detail some of the best secret service men he had in the army, have them disguise as Angelinian officers, enter the christian lines, watch the Vivian girls closely, and the moment opportunity presented itself lead them out of the lines far beyond beyond pursuit, and ride off with them to his lines.

But for the secret service men he knew that this mission was as dangerous to them as an infant crawling into a dragon's den, and so he cautioned them to be careful, what they say and do, as the Angelinians were as merciless dragons are to their victims now, and that a single break, would mean their sure finish there.

Indeed Detective Gibbons, Mc-Holleser, Burns or Sherlock Holmes could not beat these secret servicemen when at work, but nevertheless their mission was a failure. Three days had passed since the battle of Herberian, when Evans was conscious of seeing strange Angelinians officer watching everything that the little girls did, size him up when with them, ask unusual pressing questions, and follow them secretly everywhere they went.

This of course aroused his suspicions, and he watched their every move, ordered soldiers to watch them also, and warn and commanded the little girls to never go anywhere unless he was with them. The strange and queer actions of these strange officers, continued for several days, Evans having been the only one to notice it. Evans indeed suspected that these officers were not true Angelinians, but some one else in the disguise of christian officers. At first of course he had not the slightest inkling of impending harm toward the little girls believing believing that the officers followed them around, or watched their movements on account of admiring their beauty.

But finally he gradually suspected something else which led him warn the little girls not to go anywhere without him with them.

Three days later when his suspicions was greater one of the strange officers rode up to Evans with an air of one who thinks of he owns the world and said

"You are the guardian of the Vivian girls I suppose?"

"Well suppose I am." Answered Evans rather with sarcasm.

"And when you ask me questions salute first, and remember I'm general Evans and you are a lieutenant, and when you ask questions ask them in a civil manner."

"Excuse me sir but I forgot to salute." Answered the lieutenant. "Beg pardon sir."

"I never knew of an Angelinian officer let alone a private who did not salute an officer before." Said Evans. "And upon the question again. Why do you wish to know if I'm the guardian of the Vivian girls. And why do you eye me so critically? Do I look like a chicken hawk to you?"

"We see you with them all the time." Answered the officer saluting. "That is why I ask."

"Well I have got a question to ask myself." Said Evans. "How many times were you instructed to salute a superior officer. You have been saluting me at every word. Is it?"

"By gosh this man is so excited he does not know what he is doing at all." Thought Evans to himself. "If he was a true Angelinian he would not act that way."

The soldier did not answer Evans question but wheeled his horse and started off without saluting but Evans said suddenly:

"Halt don't move until I say so."

He started off but Evans drew his pistol and cried.

"Halt or I'll fire. You are to be held for examination. I believe you are one of Manley's agents in disguise. Your excited action in being confronted by an Abbeinnian general shows it."

IT the lieutenant seeing the pistol leveled at him, halted but the moment he saw his chance he darted away, but Evans did not fire.

And why? Because he was not sure of his man.

Later in the day Evans was passing a tent on foot when he heard low voices. He halted listened, and alined over the ropes between two tents, and not to the side of the tent from which the voices proceeded.

He listened.

"I'll tell you." Said one. "That wewill never succeed in carrying off the Vivian girls, with their guardian in the way. I met him to day, he was suspicious, and almost had me. I got so excited in seeing these christian generals."

"Well, what shall we do then?" Asked another.

"Lure their guardian into a trap and kill him."

"But he is too fox to be tricked. We must try something else else." Said a third man.

"To attack him openly would be folly, as he is a regular Sampson." Said a fourth man.

"Indeed I know it." Said alander. "Why not wait until to night, hide in some dark spot, wait until he comes a long and shoot him dead."

"But the sound of the shot will arouse the Abbeinnians."

Said the first speaker. "And then we will be worse off, and will have to make our escape without our prizes. Come think of something good. We have been waiting in this camp long enough."

"Oh, hush, what is the use then? Come let's go out. We may find the little snipes alone and get our chance."

Evans kept in hiding until the last man had gone out, then he made for the tent where the little girls were.

"So they are just what I thought, Manley's secret service men." Said Evans to himself. "I wonder how in heavens name they manage to get within our lines. And so they will shoot me in ambush hey? Well they will find me more fox than they think."

He reached the tent found the little girls sitting in a ring in the middle of the floor of the tent, fixing bandages for wounded soldiers.

They arose respectively as he entered, and then crowding around him asked him for news.

"Some of Manley's best Secret Service men have entered the lines."

Said Evans. "They have been plotting to carry you little girls off, but according to the conversation I just heard, they don't dare cope with me face to face. I must run into their ambush according to their conversation."

But never fear they will be prisoners before long. They are no doubt on the way looking for you little girls, believing that I left you alone."

Well we will pretend that is it is so. But I'll have this tent surrounded by soldiers and have them keep out of sight."

Evans detailed two squads of soldiers, and directing them to their hiding places, and then went into another tent to watch proceedings.

Indeed the rascally Glandelinians "a" into the trap, for they were about to enter the tent, when they were surprised by the hiding Angelinians who appeared suddenly. One however alone was captured, the rest being shot as they showed resistance or tried to get away. Again Manley had been unsuccessful in his attempt to cause the capture of Violet and her sisters.

News had come that during this occurrence that general Tenebre had fought a battle at Compendium raging seven days starting August 6-- to the 13th the christians being successful capturing general Francis Jo's army, and crushing forty one assaults made by the Glandelinians. It was a severe engagement than the one at Daisy Run the Glandelinians losing 919,942 prisoners, and 980,564 surrendered besides those of Jo's army which consisted of 250,000 men. But the first report of the Glandelinian loss in killed and injured was considered as 10,000,000. The losses were greater however but the generals refused to give the exact accounts.

Another conflict was fought with Franklin and the christian general McWhinn Mayford at Zimmermann Run. This fighting was fierce and bloody the losses of both sides being appalling, but R Franklin was forced to surrender, his army being surrounded and cut up.

This battle raged ninety six hours, starting on September 9th ending on the 10th. Losses on both sides were prohibited to be stated, though it was said by war correspondents, that from 800,000 to 9,000,000 were killed killed on the christian side.

The Glandelinians left 8 9,800,000 dead upon the fields.

GENERAL JACK EVANS RECEIVES A FAKE MESSAGE.
HIS INVESTIGATION AND WHAT COMES OF IT.

INDEED one of the most surprising things, or experiences that general Jack Evans ever yet had in his life occurred about two weeks and three days after the frightful battle of Johanna or Francis Creek the apparent greatest christian victory in the war. He apparently received a stirring as well as insulting letter from one of the Vivian Girl Princesses, but not signed only by her but also by her sisters. It was brought to him by a colonel, but a man whose face he did not like, and also whom he had never before seen in the army. At first he had the temptation to question this strange officer but fortunately did not do so. Of course he did not and could not know what to make of it. At first knowing whose writing it was he almost believed it at first. And why should he not believe it. It was surely her handwriting and no one else and that would decide the most shrewd of all men.

It was a sealed letter demanding his immediate surrender of his sword to general Ev Hanson and the handing in of his resignation from the army altogether. At first Evans was so excited and so startled and so shocked as well as shaken by it that he could not help but believe it. For a long time he sat by his table reading it over and over and wondering exceedingly what it all meant, and what could have induced them to do such a thing. And how could it be possible. After all he did for them throughout the long war. If it had not been for him they would not be alive now. Were they insane all of a sudden from their hardships or were they just tiring of his companionship?

But then it couldn't be. And besides no one brought him a message from them the day before. At first he thought all over his experiences with them during the war so far how he had helped them through all perils, how friendly and good they had been to him and how they had loved him as if they were his own sisters. And then feeling almost heart broken he decided that it was not his business to resign from his command even if they were the Princesses of Abbeannia because he really was under the full authority of Emperor Vivian, and the old Abbeannian government and he had been advised by all to receive no message from any one without investigating it first.

Also he had been appointed their chief guardian and therefore he should alone as his written statements proved and the important papers he had in his possession prove that he should alone be their superior next to their Uncle and Father or parents and relations and that only they could have a word in whether he should resign his command or not.

Of course if he really did do anything wrong, or offended them seriously in any way they could demand his resignation providing they had the Government and their father sign a note to which the report should be confirmed and it should come straight from the Government and brought to him by a general who was to take his place. And yet the note came by only a colonel and there were no government signatures or even Emperor Vivian's name on it at all. He felt fearful and yet suspicious together. Yet he was dumbfounded because it was written in Joices own hand writing and also the hand writing of her very sisters were on the signatures. But to his surprise there was something else he could not make out. Why write to him with a lead pencil. It was unusual for they usually write in ink or print the wording by a typewriter.

These thoughts somehow made Evans feel a strange suspicion come over him, a suspicion which he could not resist or throw off. Was it a trick of some body to get him out of the way. Was there someone trying to give him the Jim Jams. Evans was no fool. He did not jump at every little conclusion that came out. He was slow to believe anything, slow to even obey a message that came without the proper signature. And also he knew not why they should demand his resignation for such an insignificant thing as stated in the letter after all he did for them, and suffered and risked for them throughout the war so far. At first when he read the letter after receiving it he was both shocked, broken hearted and then fearfully an angry at them for to try to get him out of the war this in this way would be treason to their own country on their very part. After he had first read it he had just sealed the note, and stamped it and had ordered the coming of a swift horseman with the purpose to send it to Emperor Vivian when the nature of the writing, being without ink, and some thoughts that came to him made him change his mind. He knew the Glandelinian generals have tried every desperate plot to get him and their other guardians out of the way so they could destroy Violet and her sisters or to cause other harm to them as to stop their work for their country's cause. He therefore became suspicious and the more he thought of this the more suspicious and uneasy he became. He therefore determined to investigate. He read it several times more and the more he read it the more it upset him, and yet the more suspicious he became. The message was as follows:

TO HIS EXCELLENCY:
GENERAL JACK AUBROSE EVANS.....
SIR:.....

Your immediate resignation from the army is demanded. There are no explanations to be asked. You were requested to appear at our head quarters to go out with us on a scouting tour and for some reason or other you failed to come. So no excuses is necessary as we do not have time to listen to any. We don't even trust you any more no matter what you have done for us or how good we have been to you before.

VIOLET VIVIAN.
JENNIE VIVIAN.
JOICE VIVIAN.
CATHERINE VIVIAN.
DAISY VIVIAN.
HETTIE VIVIAN.
EVANGELINE VIVIAN.
A.B.C.D.
JOHANNA JUNCTION.
FRANCIS GREFFY..??

WHAT really surprised Evans more than ever was that he surely remembered that he had never received any summons from them to appear; and if they really did send a message he did not receive it. Yet from the handwriting it looked as if it was absolutely a fact that he was asked to resign his command immediately. But yet the very wording of the letter sounded or read unusually suspicious. For a long while he paced up and down in his room in his headquarters in a very bad mood indeed. And all this while at first he almost could not help driving out of his mind the thought that they were very ungrateful little Princesses to turn him down like this. To even write him a curt insulting message after all he had risked of his own will for them. For all that morning he thought y thought over in his mind all he had done for Violet and her sisters and how they had been so friendly and even loved him and risked their own very lives in many ways for him too. And then other thoughts came to him. How Righteous they were. How loving and kind and generous they were to every body. No Had Cross nurse could ever quadruple the most kind doctor in the deeds they did for the suffering wounded of both sides even of their worse enemies. The tremendous sacrifices they had made; and all they had left, home and every thing just to be in the army with common generals who were under them to serve their country and suffer all that no one else in the world has ever suffered before yet. And the more he thought of this the more he began to suspect it was a fraud. It was not in the way to do this. They could not do this to anyone who was their friend. And besides the way they had been so unusually devoted to him it seemed impossible. And resign his command at so critical a time? Why it would ruin the nation. The war would end in favor of the worst enemies of Our Blessedford and put the Vivian girls and their parents in great danger; compell them probably for safety sake to flee from some str to some strange land in exile. This could not be. He knew the Vivian girls always said that if they did not have General Evans the cause might be lost right then. And even now he imagined the beautiful little princesses were beckoning to him in their friendly way, having what we call visions of them, pleasing their games with him and of all their friendly courtesy to him and his generals. He also remembered how faithful they always were to him; and how often his generals, and even the superior generals of the armies even wise Continentian Aronturg and General Dargar had warned him not to let any thing part him from them, not to even leave them out of his sight for a day. Finally after glancing over the note again he felt a change come over him a feeling that almost confirmed his suspicions that it was a fraud. They never wrote messages in lead. They never used lead pencils except for only sketching plans and maps and the like. All messages were written in ink of by typewriter. And he also knew there were many persons persons in the world clever enough to copy correctly the handwriting of some one else. Even he could do that himself. And they could not be felt positively sure demand him to resign from his command when their nation is at stake. He then had another thought which gave him a ray of hope. Penrod the day before had been with them from morning till night while on duty with his services to them. He realized the boy could tell him the whole truth. He decided to send for the boy immediately and explain matters to him after questioning the lad. He went to the door and summoning his orderly said in his military tone; but with a slight touch of anger and nervousness in it:

"Have Captain Schofield Penrod the boy about lad sent to me!! in a hurry as it is something very important and I will tolerate no delay on the part of the messenger whatever. I want to see the boy immediately!!" The orderly saluted and withdrew. On questioning another officer Evans was then informed that the Vivian girls were visiting general Vivian and he did not know when they would return. Evans then asked:

"Were the Vivian girls out scouting yesterday afternoon?"

The officer looked surprised at the question:

Then he smiled as Evans looked so nervous.

"There is something on your mind your Excellency!! he said!! you look worried and scared about something. But they were not out so far as I know of. But you better ask Penrod their friends. He will tell you all!!"

While Evans waited for the lad to come, he took from a small dressing dresser a large round magnificent glass and examined the note through that and also the signatures of the Vivian girls. And to his surprise he noticed that through the glass the nature of the writing changed a good deal. Just as he finished and set the glass in the drawer the orderly announced the boy's arrival and then Penrod came in and stood at attention. For fully five minutes Evans did not stir but stood looking out the window. He was almost afraid to question the boy. He was apprehensive that the lad may confirm the note if they really did send it. But after standing there for that length of time he decided to have it over with. Then turning to the boy he motioned to a chair saying:

"Sit down my boy. I have some important questions I wish to ask you!!"

The boy did so and then Evans again stood in front of the window without saying anything but he trembled a little. Penrod observed that the general looked worried and angry, and nervous and acted as if he was excited but he waited for him to speak first as was his usual way. After a while he swung around and faced Penrod and looked him squarely in the eyes. Then he said with a shaking voice:

"I tell you boy I want you to tell me the truth, and know you will. Where were you yesterday all day?"

The boy was surprised indeed at this question and wondered what the general meant. For a moment the lad thought he was called to account for so a wrong deed some one might have accused him of to the general about. But he answered truthfully looking the general squarely in the face:

"At their own request sir I was with Violet and her sisters all day.

They asked me to do something for them."

"I understand, I believe you my boy," declared Evans looking more at ease.

"Had the Vivian girls any attention of having me accompany them on a scouting tour yesterday afternoon?"

"They had intentions of going out on a tour but not to have any one come along but only boy and girl scouts, but they changed their minds as there was nothing unusual to do," the boy answered. "I asked them if they wished to summon you and they said, 'No you worked too hard for them the day before and needed a rest. They praised you highly for saving the army from defeat and could hardly stop talking about it. Two of them slept all afternoon.'"

"Suppose I will not believe that," answered Evans looking at the lad almost severely.

"I'm not telling you any lie sir for a hundred officers can prove my words are a fact," said the boy in his usual decided manner. I even played a game with the rest of them all afternoon and ate supper with them. I have also other good solid proofs of all I say sir. Even Angelina Aronturg and Jennie Warner were there and will tell you."

Evans was silent for another long while. He paced up and down the room in an excited manner. He then went to his desk and with that magnifying glass made another examination of the note and comparing some of the handwriting of the original letters recently written to him by the Vivian girls. Then he made a slight startling discovery. The handwriting of the note had a marked difference when compared to the others. He now felt positively sure the note was forged by some one who thought to get rid of him or at least get him away from the Vivian girls so the Glandelinian agents or other vandals could lay their hands on them. A first he was going to dismiss the lad but decided to investigate further. So he replaced the letters and the glass, then rose from the chair and then entered the room once more causing the boy to wonder exceedingly. Then he stopped abruptly, before the boy looked keenly at him for several minutes and then observing by the boys face that he was telling the truth said:

"I'd any of the Vivian Girl Princesses write any one a message?"

"Yes sir."

Indeed this answer startled Evans: it gave him a foreboding that after all the note was not forged. However he looked at Penrod searchingly and asked with alarm in his voice:

"Are you far sure you are not mistaken?"

"No sir."

"Positively?"

"Yes sir," she wrote the note yesterday morning. I was with her when she did. She seemed to be in a hurry and sent it off without the slightest delay too. She did not wish to be questioned by any one by it though."

"If so my boy to whom did she write it?"

Evans surely expected Penrod to say "To you". Had he done so Evans would surely have received a shock. The boy himself was surprised at this question and also felt suspicious and alarmed that something was either wrong with the general or that Evans foresaw some unseen danger lurking near them but he surprised Evans also still more by saying:

"Yes she had me in person deliver the letter which I did at noon time yesterday. I returned at half an hour's time."

Evans felt easier now for the note he received came early in the morning and was delivered by a colonel, a man who he did not know and whose face he did not and had not trusted.

"And which one of the Princesses wrote it?"

"Joice, Vivian."

"Any of the others sign their names to it?"

"No sir."

"What?"

"No sir. Joice did not even put a signature of any of her sisters or her self on the note. She only signed it 'THE VIVIAN GIRLS.' She wrote the message to general Viviananna requesting him to appear before her and her sisters at 2 P.M. yesterday afternoon."

"I believe you are just making that up," said the general scowling fiercely just to try the lads firmness.

"No sir I am not," answered the lad.

"Could you produce a duplicate of that copy as she always writes another on carbon paper?"

"No sir, she only wrote that one this time and used her typewriter, and signed the words 'The Vivian Girls' with red ink."

"H.M. And where is general Viviananna now?"

"At his headquarters."

"Do you still think he has the note?"

"I'm not positive sir."

"All right my boy. I'm a superior general and he will do all I ask: go me a special favor. Go get that note if he still has it. Tell him I must see it for very important reasons. Tell him that through that very note the Vivian Girls are in danger and I am going to investigate before it is too late."

"All right sir," and the lad was off in a moment. As he rode on his horse at a swift gait he wondered exceedingly what had gotten into the general. Why the questions about the Vivian Girls, and what he was doing at their headquarters all day yesterday. Did he suspect something that was going to happen to them? And is it so what was it? And why did he examine those papers so carefully with the magnifying glass. And why did the general look so worried, act so excitedly, and angry?

In about twenty five minutes he was standing before general Viviananna and the latter was surprised exceedingly at the request and Penrod's story of his interview with Evans.

"Are you sure it's general Evans and not his double?" he asked for this was the first time Evans had ever demanded to see a letter written to some other general and it looked mighty funny to Viviananna.

"Yes sir," answered the boy. "He wishes for the note."

The general knowing he still had it, made a search for the message and finally finding it handed it to the boy saying:

"If I were you I'd warn the Vivian Girls right away. Maybe Evans is suspicious. They may be shadowed by some unseen danger."

"I'd like to warn them," answered Penrod, "but they are out now having gone since morning and I don't know when they'll return."

the Vivian Girls desire to disengage him, the would boys to print the sheet full of statements, call in full of his attention, and the lad, sent it to the government. It is stamped, sealed, and confirmed by the General. Then it would be sent to the Vivian Girls for their signatures, and then further to the Vivian Girls for their own signatures. Then the Vivian Girls would have to send it through the general (General Viviananna) (Viviananna) to be signed and confirmed from them. Then there it goes back to the government to be rewritten by the Governmental Publishers, confirmed by the Government again and brought to the general who is relieved from command by the one who succeeds him.

So this confirmed Evans that again enemies were attempting to lay their hands on the Vivian Girls but wished first to get him far enough away as Violet and her sisters would be left unprotected.

"All right then my boy," said Evans. "I know you are telling the truth. I did receive such a message and that is why I question you. I know the note is forged and will apprehend the writ or if I can. I'm a general Hanson Vivian well enough to see me."

"The Vivian Girls say he is getting along pretty well."

Evans sat at his desk and wrote a note, signed his name, sealed it, and gave it to Penrod.

"All right you may go my boy," he said. "But see that general Russell Master Johnston gets this note ordering him to place a powerful guard around the Vivian Girls headquarters. But if you see the Vivian Girls Princesses tell them I would like to have them come to see me at general Hanson Vivian's headquarters this afternoon. Tell them why if you wish. It does not matter."

"All right sir I will," answered the boy and saluting he withdrew. Evans then summoned his orderly immediately and when he came he said:

"Bring my horse. I'm going to general Hanson's headquarters right away for I have to see him on something very important."

The orderly brought the horse, and within another hour Evans was standing before his friend, who with his arm in a sling and a bandage around his head was sitting at his table looking through a lot of paper and smoking a cigar.

late that same morning Violet and her sisters had returned much earlier than they were expected. After they entered the house Joice was sprawling behind her sisters. She noticed the door of her writing room open. "That's strange," she thought. "I surely remember that I closed it this morning."

She was about to follow after her sisters and pay no attention to it when again she stopped. Suspicious of what she knew not what she stepped to the door and looked into the room. She saw it was evident some one had been at her writing table. She even found the ink bottle was used, papers strewn all over the floor and the impression of someone having written on one of her tablets with a sharp lead pencil. Looking for her writing pen she discovered it sticking into the floor near the table. But her tablet with the carbon paper between the writing sheet, sheets, had not been used. She felt scared indeed. Some one had been able to get into her room despite the guards. First thinking some of her sisters may know of it and had forgotten to tell her she thought it best not to tell them, but changing her mind she called a number of soldiers ordering them to scour the building. Then she told her sisters what she had discovered and together they went into the room to see for themselves. Being alarmed that they had been raided by some spy while they were gone they looked through all their belongings but but were still more surprised and mystified, as they did not find a single thing, whether important that was missing except excepting one of Joice's letters. Inquiring for Penrod they learned he had been summoned before general Evans. This put them more nervous. Then they examined all the writing paper but did not find a single clue as to who was in the room and left it in such an untidy condition. Nothing was missing here either.

This made their discovery much more surprising and mysterious. All the guards who had been at the house the day before as well as the morning now were questioned, but they said they were absolutely sure that no one entered the building. Of course knowing that some one must surely have entered, as the evidence was in Joice's room Violet and her sisters doubted the statements of the guards believing that the mysterious person who ever he was must have either slipped past the guards disguised as some National officer of high rank, or had posed as one of the very sentry themselves, wrote on the paper when not seen and then escaped when he was relieved.

"I'll do that," exclaimed the boy, and then saluted and left. On his return for Evans headquarters he first handed for that of the Vivian girls. On his questioning the orderly, the latter said: "They'll not be back until this afternoon. I'm afraid they are with general Vivian just now, and they are sending an important message to Emperor Vivian telling him of the glorious victory Evans won for the nation just a few weeks ago." Perrod thanked the orderly for the information and then rode off toward Evans headquarters. He was admitted into the building and seeing the general now in another room, went in, saluted, and handed him the note. General Evans thanked the boy warmly, handed him a big piece of cake and then glanced over the note. As he read it he fairly jumped to his feet. It was written in fewer letters than in the note sent to him. It read as follows:

5 DEAR STR:

YOU R DEAREST O' FRIENDS.

Evans motioning the boy to sit down read it again and compared it to the other note. The handwriting to him looked alike but their names were written on the note sent to him.

'TO THE VIVIAN G.M.L PRINCRSSES::::::::::: YOUR MAJESTIES:

GENERAL FRANCIS VIVIANANNA. "

Evans was admitted immediately into the presence of the great general Hanson vivian. After saluting and greeting him warmly Evans putting on a snbo sober face said!!!

suddenly gone crazy. He could not know what to make of it. Why his best friend and most reliable officer of all the army, one who he could depend on as much as his guardian angel leave the army at such a time as this.

"What?" he demanded "resign your command?"

"Yes sir."

General Hanson arose abruptly from his chair strode to the window and looked fixedly out for several minutes and Evans noticed that his friend was trembling. Then after several minutes the general said with emotion his voice as if he was about to cry;

"Why Evans, MY GOD, and leave us in a hole because someone else told you to do so. Never. I won't let you. I won't accept your resignation. No one can force you to. No one has any authority over you whatever. I won't have it. Why our armies can only depend on your leadership. And think what would have happened if you had not stayed Manley's success at Francis Creek near Johanna Junction. We will lose the war altogether, just when we are starting to win it. Your resignation will mean the utter ruin of the nation. Why Evans I think you are mad. No one would ask you to resign your command. They can't do it. Think how Holy our Cause is. That to back out now by resigning is the same as deserting Christ himself. The nation honors you. Emperor Vivian loves you as his own son. All the generals adore you. The Emperor wants you to take his place of his treasonable son who went over to the enemy side. You are as great a general as Concentinian Aronburg. And think of your poor friends the Vivian Girls. And all what they have done for you. And how they trust you. They are surely Princesses in this Country. They are mere little girls, pretty as can be but they are almost as powerful as their own father the Emperor of Abbeinnia. All of us generals no matter who we be or what we do or what our rank is are supposed to be under their orders. Yet no one can I believe boast that a saint can ever be like they are in goodness; and so on. I realize that you know yourself what they have risked and suffered when if they desired so they could have remained safely at home. And all the persecutions they have experienced and suffered of their own free will since the war began.

They are Emperor Vivian's daughters Evans, Princesses of our nation, but they love you more than any other man or boy Evans. To resign now would be to desert them. And think what your resignation would cause. Without you aiding you, there will surely come a disaster that will ruin our nation altogether. A disaster that will even be fatal to them the little girls whom you yourself love as much as they love you. Why my boy it is utterly impossible. You can't do such a thing. The Government would surely withhold your resignation. You would be treated as a traitor."

"I'm awfully sorry Your Excellency but it cannot be helped," said Evans.

"I have to do it much against my will. I've been ordered to do so."

General Hanson sat down in his chair almost falling into it as it were, and stared fixedly at Evans. Then he got up again, walked over to the window and looked out for an intolerably long time. Then he swung around and asked;

"Are you sure that you know what you are talking about?"

"Yes sir."

"Do you really mean it?"

"I'm afraid I'll have to say yes."

"Why then you must be crazy man," Hanson exclaimed. "For the love of God do not leave us in a hole at a time like this. No one can tell you to do this they have nothing whatever to say. It can only come from the government. For the sake of the Vivian Girls who have suffered all for us and you please remain I beg of you. Who is it that tells you you have to resign?"

Evans knew his point was now reached. He had driven in his stake. To excite Hanson Vivian in this was always fatal to any foe who wrote fake notes and this is the reason Evans did this.

"Your Excellency I would like to," said Evans smiling in spite of himself but looking nervous nevertheless. "But it is at their own orders."

"Whose orders?"

"The Vivian Girl Princesses."

"Their own orders?"

"Yes sir."

"I don't believe it."

"But it is so."

"But what did you do to offend them?"

"They requested me to go out on a scouting tour with them yesterday afternoon but I failed to obey as I received no message."

General Hanson surely gave Evans a look this time.

"My dear boy what have you been drinking to day?" he asked.

"Nothing else?"

"No sir."

"You talk like you had taken a full gallon of something much stronger than whiskey," said Hanson vivian. "They did not go out on any scouting tour's yesterday. They were too tired to do so. I believe you are giving me the jim june. Or otherwise your lung endured hard hardships has unbalanced your mind."

"No sir," exclaimed Evans. "My mind is positively sound, and I'm perfectly sober."

"And yet do you mean to say you received an order from your best friends friends that love you immensely that you are discharged from the army for a very trivial offense sir?"

"Yes sir."

General Hanson Stared at Evans.

"Have you any proofs sir?" he demanded almost angrily.

"Yes sir. Here's the message sir," and he handed it to the general. Hanson gazed nervously at Evans as he took it believing at first for a sure that Evans was really insane and then unfolding the note looked at it carefully. But it seemed to him that it was a fact. It was absolutely in Joice's handwriting. But also the names of her sisters were written in her own hand only, and not that of her sisters. He couldn't hardly believe his own eyes. At first, he thought something was wrong with his eyes and he washed them and wiped them, and then read the note four times with a trembling hand. Then after looking at it with a more careful way he suspected a ketch in it. They never did yet write any message in lead pencil. Neither did they write any in ink. They use ink only for their signatures. They write notes with a typewriter. And he if her sisters wished their names signed to a note, they would write their own names the selves, and with their own hand. And also if they wished to discharge any one they would ask the government to do it. They would never sent a discharge note to any one in particular no matter whether they signed their names to it or not because it would be of no use without the signature of their father and Emperor Hanson, whether they themselves had power to discharge any one or not. They want the signatures of their father and also that of the government on any note they make out for anything except commands to the generals. So realizing all this and knowing the ways of Violet and her sisters he felt sure it was a fake in spite of the hand writing and, therefore he said;

"I don't believe this note is real, and I suspect you know it and are trying to try me for some reason or other Evans. It cannot be. They surely wouldn't do it Evans. Why little Jennie was here yesterday evening playing a game with me and while we played the cards she praised you immensely for your taking my command when I was disabled and saving the army from a disastrous defeat at Johanna's on the Francis Creek. When the enemy smashed irresistibly through and carried all before him you came up with your own armies, rallied my troops, and smashed Manley good and hard. She said her sisters appreciated your gallantry and said lots about you. You are Concentinian Aronburgs double. Manley fears you and your army as he does Concentinian Aronburgs. And general J Concentinian Aronburg has asked the Vivian Girls to ask their father the Emperor to make you his special assistant. They told Concentinian Aronburg, and even me that they will do everything in their power not only to get you a higher command, but have their father adopt you as his step son and make you the chief Prince, and their brother, for the, and their two loyal holy brothers love you and desire you as one. And yet you get this message. I really believe it is forged by some one or you are trying to play a joke on me to test my loyalty to the cause."

Evans was now emotional and Hanson's words only too true impressed him. Then he said;

"No your Excellency I'm not fooling you or playing any jokes whatever. I did receive that message. But I and Penrod and the Vivian Girls themselves can prove to you and me also that it is forged. That is why I startled you this way as you and I know by such means it gets the best results and makes it worse for the one who wrote it. I came to consult you about this and would like to interview general Dargar if possible. Penrod who gave me all the information brought me this original note written by Joice to general Viviananna and it has not at all the same number of words and only signed 'THE VIVIAN GIRLS.' No message have been placed at all. I have asked Penrod to send them to come here to see me in person and have a strong body guard accompany them. If possible I'll capture the writer of this fraudulent note. The Princesses as I hope are strongly escorted so no one will be able to do them any harm. "I'm glad you did," said Hanson with a forced smile. "But this message is a serious, a very grave and criminal deed, and the penalty, especially for its purpose alone is death. I wonder if the great Gemini Leader is within the lines yet. He's been out scouting this morning. I'll find out."

At his side stood one a colonel. "Is general Dargar in yet?" general Hanson inquired. "Yes sir," answered the officer. "He returned over an hour ago from a scouting tour. He is very excited and angry about something." "Will you summon him here please?" "Yes sir. But there is no need to sir. He is coming and will be here in a few minutes. He has sent word he wishes to see you on something very important, something that will stir you as well as interest you very much."

"Thank you," said Hanson. The officer then withdrew. Hanson got out his own glass, and going again to the window examined the original, and the fake note, while Evans went to Hanson's telegraph instrument and wrote an order to general Vivianama to have all strangers no matter who they were arrested immediately, and held for cross examination, and to notify the outside guard not to allow no one not even officers of the highest rank outside the lines and to hold and question those who enter.

"It may not be possible to apprehend the writer now, that is the one to forged the message," he said to Hanson who was giving the notes a cross examination. "But there is a vile purpose behind that fake message and therefore I'll prevent it before it is too late. It is surely evident the message was sent to me with the purpose of some kind to get me far enough away so the Vandals can assassinate the Vivian girls, before their vile purpose is known. Of course, I first suspected the message was a fact but not for long for I then caught on to the truth. I'll tell you Hanson my friend there will be no quarter shown to all prisoners hereafter if general Manley and his rebel gangs don't keep their vandals out of our camps and leave the Vivian girls alone. This thing just infuriates me, drives me crazy."

Hanson gave a smile, a smile that was grim to see and it suddenly changed to a fearful scowl. "There will come a time when I'll give no quarter either if these brutalities and atrocities on the part of all the glandelinians do not stop," he said grimly. "They are rebels, traitors, and never did deserve quarter anyway."

A few minutes had now passed, and the officer appeared; "Your Excellency," he said. "The great Gemini Leader is here sir. He wishes to see you on something important sir."

"A moment please," said general Hanson frowning in a perplexed way. "Tell him I'm glad he is here. I've something important too." The orderly saluted and withdrew, and in another moment general Dargar appeared. He saluted both Hanson and Evans and then shook hands with both very warmly. Then before general Hanson could speak he said;

"I returned from a scouting tour an hour ago and some of my members have returned after having been in Manley's shattered army for three days." Then turning to Evans he said to him; "I'm glad you have had the Vivian girls guarded. They are in danger from disguised Vans Vandals who are hidden within our lines. I have this morning received a fake message from general Hanson Vivian, my friend here, and also a message from all of the Vivian girls, another from Jennie Turner, and Gertrude Angeline and even you Evans that my services are no longer required. If it had only received such a message and only one I might have been startled and believed it true but so many looked very suspicious. And the handwriting is correct, as to theirs, Hansons, and your own. If it is not an enemy trying to get at the Vivian girls then this writing is all from some mad man within our lines."

Evans and Hanson looked at each other. Then ordering his orderly to bring him every writing tablet he had in to him. Hanson showed Dargar the note sent to Evans, and after giving him a lengthy detail about what had occurred Hanson asked Dargar to show him those he had received, and he did. He looked at them carefully, and saw the one with his, and the very handwriting of the others. Then the orderly appeared and said; "Nothing is missing sir, except the duplicate copy of a letter you wrote to your wife."

"That accounts for my charge message," said general Hanson smiling to himself. "Take the general Dargar and see if you can detect the writing in any way." General Dargar looked at them long and carefully with his powerful instrumental glass after reading their contents once more. He looked surprised and said;

"There's a marked handwriting difference in the handwriting sent to Evans and me," he said. "The instrumental glass shows it plainly. Put I'm afraid I cannot say its forged enough to start an investigation until the Vivian girls see the notes themselves." At this moment an officer appeared.

"The Princesses have arrived," he announced. "Big body guard accompanied them sir and they wish to see you and Evans immediately. They are excited about something and wish to see you without delay. Find them are; 'Admit them at once and don't talk so much.'" thundered Evans getting angry at so much hot air on the part of this talkative officer. "Yes indeed, what do you think you are a talking machine?" demanded Hanson. "Admit them at once."

The talkative officer withdrew, their arrival was then announced by the orderly and then they came in like seven fairy spirit sprites and after greeting generals Hanson and the two others in their usual friendly way were brought to light about the notes sent to Hanson, Dargar, and Evans. They immediately proved that they wrote no notes to Evans or Dargar whatever and also stated that on their return from their scouting tour unusually early, finding her room door open and knowing she had closed it when she left, went in and found five sheets of her writing paper had been used, the ink bottle upset, the cork out, the ink all over the table in a black puddle, the pen stuck in the floor and the evidence of some one having wrote something with a lead pencil but not using the tablet with the carbon paper between the sheets. It was evident if he had he would have surely left some clues behind him. No one had seen him enter the building, or going out, and the fact that the headquarters of Violet, and her sisters was so strongly guarded made it look very suspicious to every one. Her sisters had not been in Joices room all day or the morning after and therefore did not know what had happened though they could not help suspecting one of the sentries, for it was said and talked a out about that one of them got relieved from duty by pretending he had been taken seriously ill all of a sudden. "He," said all physicians had been questioned but not one of them had received a guard, or any soldier or even non combatant who was sick or suffering from any ailment whatever. And he had disappeared.

General Dargar examined all the notes and decided they were evidently forged by that seriously "SICK" guard who wished by this trick to give general Jack Evans and Dargar out of the way so the Vivian girls would be without the desired protection of their guardian and other powerful retainers. General Dargar desired to examine Joices room, and so they all set out for the headquarters of the Vivian girls. When they reached it they found it as strongly guarded as Evans had ordered and were questioned throughly before they were admitted, even the girls were questioned by the guards for fear they might be clever glandelinian boyscouts posing as the Vivian girls. However seeing they were alright they were admitted by the guards at the door, and they all went into Joices room and the great Gemini started to examine everything she had. But the write of the note I notes left no clue behind him whatever. Learning that none of the Princesses missed anything of their other personal property general Dargar said;

"Did you keep or throw away the duplicate copies of the letters you wrote to any one girls?"

"We were foolish enough not to make any," answered Violet. "Yet we are always careful not to let our handwriting get into the possession of any one we do not know."

"What letters did you lose?" he asked of general Hanson himself.

"I do not know of any except the duplicate of the one written to my wife," he said. "I believe the guard did not say much. But I'll send a speedy horseman to bring them."

"I'll go and get them," said Penrod who had now come in.

"No my boy you stay right here with us," said Violet seriously. "You are usually in as much trouble with the enemy as we are, and we don't want anything to happen to you. The horseman will go."

It was five minutes before the horseman appeared, and ten minutes before he returned with the letters. They were examined and sure enough his duplicate to his wife, and one of the letters written to him by Joice and Jennie Vivian were gone envelope and all but Dargar said he hoped to trace the writer if possible by means of the finger marks left on some of the letters. A lot of his members including himself were great finger print experts and could trace any one through them, as all soldiers of both sides in the armies, have their finger prints taken when entering the army and he decided to begin on all strangers, prisoners and the like. So he left to issue the order right away, but general Hanson vivian stayed with Evans and Violet and her sisters to talk of all that had happened concerning the note.

Violet and her sisters looked at Evans and then taking the fake messages read them only once. Then Joyce said; "I'm glad Evans dear that you investigated and did not act too hastily. Of course I know that you almost believed the note was a fact. You could not help it because the full likeness of my handwriting would deceive anyone. But Evans dear, I'll bet you received quite a shock when you read it."

"I'll say I did, and I did believe the whole thing at first," confessed Evans. "But when I was most excited, I suddenly remembered all the tricks rebel spy agents do to try and get rid of your guardians, and therefore ordered the special guards to watch your headquarters and guard it against these vandals, and another one to escort you on your way to general Hanson Vivian's headquarters. All strangers within our lines are ordered to be held for investigation, and soon if it is possible we will have the writer of that forged note."

"Yes you are a most wise move," said Catherine. "But we observe from your experience it would be dangerous for us to hereafter to send written messages to any one. I know that spies of all kinds lurk within our lines, and are in all sorts of disguises, and also pose as guards, retainers, priests, officers of all rank, nuns and the like. Therefore I do not know what to do."

"Communicate with us generally by wireless telegraph," suggest general Hanson. "It will be safer and will surely reach us where war written messages often fail."

"That may be alright for us but supposing some one will surely have the chance to really trick Evans again by wireless telegraph also. We must think of some other plan to prevent that by all means."

For a while they were at a loss of what they should do. At first they had thought it best to send Penrod to Evans when they desired to see him, but then they realized that also the spy agents would be keeping their eyes on him and if he has a certain message to carry to any general they would surely seize him to get the information if possible. Then suddenly Violet thought of a clever plan, and first suggested it to her sisters, and when they agreed, she said;

"I believe I have a good plan if you agree to it Evans dear. That instead of sending any written notes or messages to you when we wish to see you, to come ourselves with a powerful escort."

After thinking for a while Evans said; "I can't hardly approve of the plan. It seems queer for good dignified little Princesses to have to come to me instead of I coming to you. It does not look right to me at all. It is not at all polite for me."

"But for your own personal safety, as well as ours it is the best and only way," said Evangeline Vivian. "We were not at your place when you received the fake message but I or my sister even can understand what a shock you must have suffered when you at first believed it. And I'm sure you don't want to receive another such message. Those spies will do anything to get you as far away from us as possible. If you love us as we know you do you will agree to our plan."

"I guess there is no other way out that I can see," said Evans with a smile. "Therefore I'll agree to your plan to send no notes but to all allow it possible for you little Princesses to come yourselves."

"That's the good boy," said Hanson Vivian exultantly. "Always give in to them Evans. They are wise little girls and always know what is best to do for us all. Therefore to make it safer for you and them the best plan is just as they suggested, that they come to you themselves, and not send you any more messages of any kind in writing hereafter."

"Yes it seems very impolite on my part but it is safer for them," answered Evans. "But I must confess that I do not like the idea just the same. But I'll have to agree to it. So it will be as they wish. I'll refuse then nothing whatever."

"But how about the writer of that message?" asked Jennie.

"What do you mean?" asked Evans.

"She means is there any chance to bring about his capture," said Daisy. "I'm afraid it is not possible at all now," declared Hettie Vivian.

"It was long before the fraudulence of the note was discovered and he may be safely within some Glandelinian camp by now. I don't believe he fled to Manleys as Manleys is too shattered to even protect the general and his gang almost. Even Manley is gone already and we are to follow to night."

"Do you think it is too late for general Dargar to trace the felonious spy now?" asked Evans.

"Yes said Violet. It may even be too late to even make any attempt to trace those who wrote these forged letters. And I do not believe it was done by only one. It may have been done by five different persons spies who may be clever enough to copy any one's handwriting to a perfect T."

"Yes that's so," put in general Hanson. "I believe myself that this was discovered too late. The writer, or writers had ample time to escape to the enemy's line or to hide where no one can locate them. He, or they may even now not be among any of the strangers who are held because I know for sure these spies who ever they are would not be so foolish as to remain within our lines where he or they would surely be captured among those in the wholesale arrests. And it may be probable that all these strangers every one of them may be totally innocent at that. Of course general Dargar will make an attempt to capture the forgers but I do not think it is possible, and he had said so himself. And yet to try to trace a spy within general Manley's army once he escaped from us and took shelter there is exceedingly dangerous work, like putting your head into a dragon's mouth."

"I wonder if it was not written by one of these or by both of these Professional International spies?" asked Joyce.

"International spies," said Hanson. "Those spies are so clever that there is nothing they cannot do. I've been thinking of them a long time."

"It may be it was them at that," said Evans. "I've heard that those spies were hired special by the Glandelinian government. They are crafty spies however, and would not do their work for nothing. The rebel government pays them $10,000 for every successful spying work they accomplish for Glandelinia's cause. They are foreigners though, and of what nationality they are of they refuse to tell any body they know, though they look decidedly like horn spa spanards to me. And they are doing it only for the money too. They are not doing it just because they take side of the rebel government. And if they felt sure which government pays them most for their services, that government they would serve. If our government would pay them $30,000 though no doubt would leave Glandelinia's cause, and do the work for us. It is not the cause they side for. It is the capitol they are after. And they'll do anything fair or crooked to succeed in their work. And their cleverest disguises are never the same. And they never tell their real names. When they were first seen within the Christian lines under general Kindernine some time before the battle of Ester Starring they were taken for the real likeness of Nutt and Jeff which many of us even have seen in what they call comic pages of all newspapers in ours as well as the foreign countries."

But they never act like those we seen in the Comics, and the smallest man is the boss of the other as he is a general and the taller man only a colonel. And the smaller man is the main professional spy and the tall man his helper. Their names are Francis Pedro Angeloni and the other one Christie Nero Fania by facts which many investigations have found out, but they have changed their names so often for every different work they planned to do that it would probably take a Dictionary to put them all down."

"But which one of the two is the most dangerous?" asked the girls.

"The smaller man is," answered Evans. "He is the very one to keep your eyes open for. If he gets any one in his trap they are usually gone."

"We'll then we have our plans which will be for your own safety," said

Jennie. "We want to tell you Evans that you must not receive any more notes ever said to be written to us or from us. No matter who brings it don't even read it as it is sure to be a fake. And if you happen to forget and do read them do not believe their contents."

"Not even if it is in your own hand writing!"

"No never. Do not believe it. You were fooled once already as you know this morning, and if you had fallen entirely for that fake note, and could have resigned your command, your going away would have put our nation in the greatest peril ever. You have licked Hanley to a finish in the battle at Johnanna on Francis Creek but that does not say we are yet winning the war. I and my sisters as you often knew did not believe we were ever on the winning side. And if you had resigned our fears would surely have been confirmed. It believe now when I think of that note, that that may have been the sole purpose of the enemy. Maybe that note did not concern any agent at that coming to try and destroy us by assassination. I believe now that it may have been a trick to get you to go away from the camp and of the army so that the army would be without a sufficient leader that could so soundly thrash the enemy. And knowing you are that man, the enemy tried to trick you. Therefore we advise you earnestly never to believe any note you do read or receive hereafter. Promise that won't you Evans dear?"

"I certainly will," answered Evans. "and for that also I'll be on my guard and will take even the higher command you have decided to ask for me. That will fool Hanley all the more." And so it was settled.

In the meantime meantime General Dargar and all his Christian members and all others make a cross examination of all the prisoners or especially strangers that had been arrested, but it was found out that none of them knew anything about the affair. And all Glandelinian prisoners who were questioned would not tell anything not even for the worst grilling. Some were even tortured and would not tell, though some said defiantly that they knew. When asked however if it was anything concerning the Vivian girls they would defiantly say "No", that they were not in any peril whatever but that just the same it was not any of the business of any of the Christian generals. All prisoners of those prisoners and even all of the very Christian soldiers were examined with the ones that General Dargar had discovered on the letters, that had been molested in Hanson's room, but not one of these could be compared with them. This of course made General Dargar and his members very perplexed. To go into the enemy lines just now was not possible, for if it was tried it would only be a fatal adventure if Hanley's men were not in any way to tamper with any strangers entering their lines.

Therefore General Dargar had to notify General Hanson the next day when the Christian armies had again halted in their advance that it seemed probable that the one who had written the notes had been swallowed up in the earth, for he could not be traced. He declared he had taken the chances of sending strict and clever spies into the enemy's lines, but that all their efforts had been unavailing as there was no information to be had, that all rebel officers did not say a word about plans or the like or anything about spies having gone into the Christian lines. Therefore General Hanson firmly believed the spy had either left the Christian army, and gone into some other far distant rebel army or that he was so cleverly disguised as not to be detected, and was still hidden somewhere still within the Christian lines. Therefore he ordered General Dargar to have his members remain within the Christian lines for a month or so and to keep their eyes on all stranger strangers, to shadow all the strangers if possible, and if any of them happen to act in any suspicious manner to at once arrest them and have them brought before the Court Court Marshall Tribunal and grilled until they do tell something, even if they are grilled to death for refusing to reveal anything.

"I'm going to find out who wrote those notes if I have to go into the Infernal home of the fiends to do so," said Hanson grimly.

MORE ADVENTURES FOR GERTRUDE ANGELINE AND HER FRIENDS.....

"Seems to me indeed" said Gertrude Angeline or Angelina Aronburg as she sat beside Angeline Pichee under one of the big mass of great trees looking out over the blue wide expanse of the great Mc-Hollester Run river. "Seems to me Angeline dear that the more we know about the fury of this war, and about the ferocity of the enemy the more we find we don't know."

"I cannot quite make that out yet," Gertrude answered Angeline Pichee in a serious tone of voice after a thought of over a minute during which her eyes followed those of Gertrude across the blue but glassy surface of the sea like expanse of the River water. "Seems to me though," she added that all we learn is just so much gained, from experience."

"I know at least it looks that way in most cases," said the brave girl spy, nodding her pretty head. "But they say that those who usually know the least have a habit of thinking that they already know all there is to know, while all those who may happen to know know the most admits what a terrible big war it is. It's the knowing ones that realizes in ones life time that usually time ain't long enough to get more than a few years of knowledge of the war without experiences init and so on."

Angeline Pichee did not answer. She also was a brave little girl with golden hair, wearing a pink dress and a bonnet, and had big solemn but brave looking eyes and an earnest but not simple manner as in usually seen in children. And when she looked at you there was something in her eyes that would make you fear her even though she was a child. Gertrude Angeline and her friend Jennie

Turner had been her most faithful companions during the war or during her trying outings in the war, and Gertrude herself had taught her almost anything she almost knew now. Gertrude Angeline was a wonderful girl despite her age and form and beauty. Not so very tall for her age only eleven and her hair was of a shining golden color. Her eyes had a gentler look than even in those her of her two companions and were pale blue in color and her face was round and bronzed. Gertrude Angeline always wore a red or dark pink ribbon on the left side of her head and sometimes on the right. Ever since meeting these two girls or the Vivian girls Gertrude and they have become close comrades and during the war enjoyed many strange and daring adventures together. It was said by many Angelinian generals that the Angels of war that may have been present at the birth of these little girls and marked their foreheads with their invincible signs, so that these little girls were able to see and do many wonderful things that even the little Dorothy and her friends in the Land of Oz would be envious or surprised about. The big trees under which the two girls were sitting was on top of a high rise of ground, but a long path ran down to the bank of the river in a long but zigzag way to the rivers edge, where Gertrude's boat was moored to a tree standing close to the shore by means of a scout river. It was a hot sultry afternoon, with scarcely a breath of air stirring, so the two girls had been sitting beneath the shade of one of the trees, waiting for the sun to get low enough for them to continue their row down the river to one of the Christian armies for which they were traveling for. They had decided also if they had the opportunity to visit Violet and her sisters. The Vivian girls and their ways were a source of delight to both girls, and with them they always always liked to go into the enemy's lines and explore their awesome encampments at any risks.

"I believe Gertrude," remarked Angeline Pichee at last "that it must be time for us to start on our way."

Gertrude cast a shroud glaze place at the shore line of the river and also at the distant sky, the river and the motionless boat and the landscapes in the far distance.

"Maybe it is time, Angeline," he answered "but I don't like the looks of these things this afternoon, and I have heard that there has been many battles raging here and near and far."

"What is wrong about that?" Angeline asked wonderingly.

"Don't say as yet. Things is too quiet to suit me that is all. No breeze is stirring, the river has not a single ripple, nary a bird flying anywhere, and it appears to be one of the hottest days ever felt yet. I ain't no prophphet of any kind, Angeline but any one with my experience knows the signs is ominous. There are glandolinians somewhere or atleast there must be a disaster or a battle that has happened within or with out our hearing distance."

"There is nothing wrong that I can see I'm sure," said Angeline "cheer. If there were clouds in the distance to show signs of a distant battle, or a cloud in the sky to warn of a coming storm we might have something to worry about; but look! Gertrude everything is as clear as can be and there is not even a suspicious sound."

Gertrude looked in every direction again and then nodded.

"Perhaps we can find our way to a christian army of some size, alright!" she agreed, not wishing to disappoint her. "It is only a little way out to find one of the army armies under general or Henson Vivian, and we will be on the watch, so come along Angeline."

Together the two girls descended the long winding path to the beach of the big river. It was no trouble for the little girls to keep their footing on the steep way, but once in a while they had to hold on to rocks and roots now and then to save themselves from tumbling when they came to steep points. They reached the big rowboat safely and while Riches was untying the rope, Gertrude reached into a small satchel on the boat and drew out several guns and other things, besides some candle-candles and matches. Gertrude's small satchel always contained a variety of strange objects, useful and ornamental, which usually even made Angeline Riches wonder where they all came from or where she got them, and why Gertrude should treasure them.

She had two big jackknives and two little ones, some bits of cord, fishhooks, and nails which she had handy for certain occasions. She also had some tin boxes with unknown contents, pinners, and the like which seemed quite necessary for her to carry around. Of course that was Gertrude's business however, and now that she added the other things to her collection, Angeline Riches made no comment, for she knew these things were to light their way in case they had to go through a dense woods. At night time Gertrude being always the spyiest and the strongest mostly rowed the boat for she certainly handled the oars with the skill and strength of a boat racer. Angeline Riches sat in the stern and steered. The place where they had embarked was something like a little bight or circular bay as soon as they came sometimes on the shore of the ocean but soon the boat crossed a larger bay of the big river toward a distant headland, where it was believed a certain christian army would be located and where some of the camps may be at the very waters edge. They were nearly a mile from shore and were heading for the middle of the river when Angeline Riches suddenly sat up straight examining something with spy glasses and exclaimed:

"What's that Gertrude?" and she pointed.

Gertrude stopped rowing and turned half around to look.

"That," she replied "looks to me mighty like a great war ship bearing down upon us full speed."

"What make it, an Angolinian or a rebels, Gertrude?"

"It appears to be an Angolinian warship but it is flying the glandolinian flag. I was afraid we would meet with trouble, Angeline. Things did not look right everything even is so still."

"The warship is coming closer," said Riches. "I believe she means to run us or something."

Gertrude grabbed the oars and now began rowing with all her strength.

Angeline's face was a little paler as she grasped the tiller firmly and tried to steer the boat out of its way; but she said not a word to indicate fear. The swirling roar of the water as the monster cleaved through it with almost the speed of an express train as the battleship came nearer made a roaring sound that was fearful to listen to. So fierce and powerful was the ship cutting the water as it advanced that the water roared in a long wall of foam on each side of the dreadnaught. The boat in which Gertrude Angeline and her companion were riding, was just in the way of the oncoming monster, and Gertrude knew very well that unless she forced the little craft away from the onrushing ship, that they would soon be forced to jump into the water or be killed as the boat was struck. So she exerted all her might and pulled as she had never pulled before, but just as it was evident she was making it, a shot from probably the shore struck one of the oars which snapped in two with such suddenness as to sent Gertrude sprawling upon the bottom of the boat. She scrambled up quickly enough and glanced toward the oncoming warship. It was closer. When she looked at Angeline Riches, who sat quite still, with a serious far away look in her sweet eyes. She had not stopped as it was now being paddled onward now, Gertrude having lost her oar on her too, and the warship was drawing nearer and nearer. Any further effort to escape the collision was useless, and realizing this, Gertrude made signs that if the ship does not steer soon both will have to jump for it. She did not try to speak for the roar of the waters would have drowned the sound of her voice. These two faithful comrades had faced dangers of many kinds before, even with the Vivian girls, but nothing to equal that which now faced them. Yet Gertrude nothing the look in Riches eyes, and remembering how often she or even the Vivian girls had been protected by unseen powers, did not quite give way to despair. The big warship now growing nearer and nearer looked very terrifying and seemed to tower above them like a mountain ship, but they were both brave enough to face it, and await the result of the adventure. They were good swimmers and if they had to do it they would jump.

They looked carefully and observed that they were a long distance out from the shore but the warship was approaching very swiftly. So much more swiftly that at Gertrude began to get panic stricken and so she and Angeline Riches suddenly made a leap from the boat and dived headlong into the water. The ship crashed into the rowboat, smashing it into splinters but the little girls had been just in time. The two girls landed almost on top of each other as they dived and had being separated they p, swam onward and onward as fast as their strength would allow, toward the farthest most shores of the river. At first they swam like sharks swift and sure, but presently they seemed to be going more moderately, and Angeline Riches was almost sure that she felt unseen arms encircling about her, as if they were supporting her and protecting her. As it had become very dark as night had now fallen she or her friend could see nothing, especially because the splash of water at times filled their eyes and blurred their vision, but they clung fast to their desperate task, and so though getting more and more exhausted they gradually neared the distant shore, until being almost over come by fatigue they had to keep themselves afloat on their backs and rest for a while. But it seemed to Angeline Riches that they were not swimming toward the same shore from which they had come on the boat. The water fortunately here in the river at this part did not have any strong current and so they had been able to reach the shore without further pursuit and finally reached the beach of the river where they lay at full length on a choking and gasping for breath and wondering for a few minutes what had happened to them. Angeline Riches was the first to recover from the fatigues of the desperate swim of a mile and a half. Disengaging herself from Gertrude Angeline wet embrace and sitting up she rubbed the water from her eyes, and then looked around her. A soft reddish glow lighted the ground from some fire in the far distance, which to her seemed to be a sort of conflagration, for on the horizon line was a long arc of light or ruddy glow, and a pillar of smoke.

Beyond she observed an immense forest of trees. They had been able to reach it through a beach near a forest the beach having clear white sand, which slanted upward from the river at their feet--the immense river that flowing westward divided into three sections near the sea and ran in through different sections of virgin Wickiey th us dividing the city as mentioned before. Above the reach of the river waters above the beach itself was the immense forest whose recesses the distant glow of the fire beyond did not penetrate. The forest looked grim and lonely, but Gertrude was thankful that she was still alive and free and had suffered no severe injury during her trying adventure with the rebel battleship and he swam across a mile and a half of almost ice cold water. At her side Gertrude Angeline was spitting and coughing, trying to get rid of the water she had swallowed while keeping herself under water to prevent herself from being hit should the enemy on the ship fire their guns. Both of the little girls were soaked through, yet the weather was warm, it being a sultry night, and a wetting did not dismay the two little girls in the least.

She crawled slowly up the slant of sand and gathered in her hand a bunch of green grass that was soft and long, with which she rubbed Gertrude's face, and cleared the water from her eyes and ears. Presently Gertrude sat up and stared at her friend intently. Then she nodded her head and said in a gurgling voice; "Mighty good Richee dear. Mighty good. We did not go to our deaths that time did we? Though why we did not, and why we got here safe and sound is more than I can make out. Maybe our guardian angels help us up."

"Take it easy," Gertrude said. Angeline Richee. "We are safe enough I guess as long as we do not meet enemies out here."

Gertrude squeezed the water out of her skirt and felt of herself and finding that she had brought all her person with her she gathered more courage to examine closely their strange surroundings.

"Where do you think we are now?" she asked of Angeline Richee. "Can't say Gertrude. Perhaps we are in one of the famous woods of Calaveras."

Gertrude only shook her head. "No," said she. "I don't think that is possible at all. The distance we came up to here was not half as far as the distance we rowed down the river, and you will not notice that this woods is extremely dense. It's a regular dense forest, a perfect jungle, and unless there is some passage through it, we are lost babes in the woods."

Angeline Richee looked thoughtfully over her shoulder. "When we are rested somewhat and get out clothes a little dry," she said, "we will crawl up to the summit of this rise of ground and see if there is a passage through the woods or a way out at least."

Gertrude Angeline reached the inside pocket of her waist to see if her important papers she had secured from the enemy's camp she raided that day were still safe. It was still dry for she kept it in an oilskin pouch. Her mate was also safe being in a thick tin box and her candles though having been wet were still with her and would burn. This good discovery helped Gertrude to think what to do when she was in difficulty. Also the safety of the important papers she had secured did much to restore the little girls' composure, after her long ducking, terrible fright, and long swim--a fright that was more on Angeline Richee's account than her own. The sand was perfectly dry where they sat and warm too, and soaking up the water that dripped from their clothing. When Angeline had squeezed the wet out of her hair and Gertrude had done the same they began to feel much like themselves again. By and by they got upon their feet and crept slowly and carefully up the steep incline to the trees above. Many of these were of huge size, but by passing passing around them they were able to get to a small pathway.

"Yes," said Angeline Richee, with interest. "Here's a small path or a road."

"The whole woods is as black as a cavern of crabs," he remarked Gertrude. "Just the same," answered Angeline Richee. "We ought to explore it and see where the road leads to, could it be the only possible way we can get out of this region?" Gertrude Angeline eyed the roadway doubtfully.

"It may be a way out of the woods," Angeline said. "But it may lead into a way or a far worse place than this. I'm not sure but our best plan is to stay right here until daylight. We may run into a rebel camp in the dark, or be ambushed or something."

Angeline Richee was not sure either, when she thought of it in that light. After a while she and Gertrude made their way back to the sands again. As they sat down, Angeline Richee looked at Gertrude's bulging pockets, pockets which were not bulging before.

"How much food or nuts or fruits or something did you secure, Gertrude?" she asked.

"I have pockets full of berries, and some walnuts that I found with the help of my candle," she replied. "Do you want some of them now, Richee?"

"He who shook her head, saying; "That ought to keep us alive for about three days or more if we are careful of the matter. It may be a long tramp through those woods."

"It may take longer than that, Angeline dear," said Gertrude, but her voice was a little trouble and unsteady.

"But if we foolishly stay here we are bound to starve or be captured by the enemy or something worse may follow," continued the girl. "While if we follow the path pathway I suggested--"

"Some things are more harder to face than starvation," said Gertrude. Angeline in a grave tone of voice. "We do not know what is in those dark forbidding woods, Richee dear, nor where that path might lead us to. It is better to wait until the approach of daylight."

"Here is a way to find that out," Angeline Richee persisted. Instead of replying Gertrude began searching in one of her little waist pockets. She soon drew out a package of fish hooks, and a long line which she had concealed about her person. Angeline Richee watched her join them quickly together. Then Gertrude crept a little way up the slope and turned over a big rock. A large number of small glow worms began squirming for shelter, but Gertrude caught them, not being afraid of worms as girls usually are and putting the greater number of them into one of her tin boxes and soon closing it she placed one worm on her hook, and the box on one side of her. Going or coming back to the waters edge she swung the hook over her shoulder and circling it around her head cast it nearly five hundred feet from the shore into the water or fifty feet into the water from the shore I mean, where she allowed it to sink gradually, paying out the line as far as it would go. When the end of it was reached, she waited patiently for several minutes and then feeling a tug on the line began drawing it in again, until it was seen she had caught a crab. This Gertrude then decided to use as a fish bait and cast the line in a second time, and a third but without success. Angeline Richee began to believe that either there were no fishes at this part of the river or they would not bite the crab bait and advised Gertrude to remove the crab and try another worm. But she was as good as any old fisherman, and not easily discouraged. When the crab finally got away she put another worm on the hook. Tentative Angeline Richee tired of watching her had grown sleepy, and lay down upon the sands, where she fell fast asleep. During the next two hours, her clothing had dried completely, as did that of Gertrude's. They were both as used to the coldest kind of water, that there was no danger of their taking cold. Finally Angeline Richee was awakened by a loud splash beside her and a cry of satisfaction from Gertrude Angeline. She opened her eyes to find that Gertrude Angeline had landed two river fish with weight weighing at least three pounds. This cheered her considerably, and she hurried to scrape together a pile of twigs and bigger pieces of wood and dry grass, while Gertrude cut up one of the fish with her jackknife, and got it ready for cooking.

They had cooked fish with a brushwood and dried grass or leaves before. Gertrude Angeline wrapped the fish in one of the cleaner grass and dipped it into the river water to dampen it. When she lit a match, and though several matches were blown out by the wind she succeeded in setting fire to the heap that Nichee made, which speedily burned down to a glowing bed of ashes. When they laid the wrapped fish on the red hot ashes, covering it with more grass, dry grass, and allowed this also to catch fire, and burn to embers. After feeding the fire with dried grass and leaves for some time, Gertrude finally decided that their supper was ready, so she scattered the ashes, and drew out the bits of fish, still encased in their smoking wrappings. When these wrappings were removed, the fish was indeed found perfectly cooked, and both girls ate of it freely. It had a slight flavor of grass burned wood, and leaves and yet would have been better if sprinkled with salt. The soft red fiery glow which until now had lighted the sky, began to grow dim, the fire no doubt of the conflagration going out, but there was a great vanity of leaves in the woods, so after they had eaten their fish, they kept the fire alive for a time by giving it a handful of fuel now and then. When from an inner pocket Gertrude drew out an army canteen which she filled with river water and after she handed it to Angeline who drank as much as she could, Gertrude refilled it and drank her own fill.

"Suppose," said Angeline Nichee staring at the glowing wood fire and speaking very slowly, "that we can catch all the fish we need in the river, or secure all the game and berries or fruits in the woods, how about our drinking water?" Gertrude! It is usually hard to find a stream in the woods."

At first Gertrude moved uneasily but did not reply. Both of them were thinking about the dark recesses of the dense woods, but while Angeline Nichee had little fear of it, Gertrude could not overcome her dislike to enter the woods at night, or go through it at night time. She knew that Angeline Nichee was right through though to remain here on the river shore, where they now were during the day, could only result in probable discovery and capture by the enemy who were hunting everywhere for them. It was now past nine o'clock, so the little girl became drowsy and fell asleep. After a time Gertrude slumbered on the sands beside her. It was very still and nothing disturbed them for hours. When at last they awoke it was daylight and the sun was high in the sky. They had eaten and cooked the fish and were munching berries for their breakfast, when they were startled by a sudden noise on the top of the bank above them. Looking upward to see what was the cause of the noise they saw emerging from the edge of the woods the most curiously dressed man they had ever beheld. However it was not even a man but a boy of about fourteen or fifteen years of age. He wore a long gray coat of very thin clothing or cloth with a big rounded hood of white color in front, with some designs around the hood shaped like inverted chopping bowls.

His trousers were of blue gray color and shaped to look like a khaki uniform pants. He had a big rounded hat like a girl child wears and a crest of wavy plumes of a scarlet, yellow, blue and purple and green color on the very top of the rounded hat. The strangely dressed boy must have been a head taller than Gertrude as he stood looking down upon them from his perch, and his appearance was so sudden, and unusual that both Gertrude and Angeline Nichee stared at him in wonder--in wonder that was not mixed with fear, and suspicion. The eyes of the boy that regarded them, as he stood on the bank above them, were bright and also mild and good in expression, and the boy made no attempt to attack them and seemed quite as surprised by the meeting as they were.

"I wonder," whispered Angeline Nichee. "Who he is?"

"Who he is?" exclaimed the boy in a high pitched voice. "Why I'm a boy scout."

"Oh," said the girl. "But what kind of a boy scout?"

"I'm a boy scout," he repeated, a little proudly. "And if ever a boy scout was glad to get through the rebel lines, and to safer safer ground again you can be mighty sure that I am that special individual boy scout."

"Have you been in peril from the enemy long?" Inquired Gertrude Angeline, thinking it only polite to show an interest in the strange boy even if she had never known him before or his character.

"Why this last pursuit of the enemy lasted ten minutes, I believe and that is about long enough too long for comfort." was the reply. "But last night I was in an awful pickle, I assure you. The glandelinians almost caught me and my comrades when they ambushed me and you."

"Oh were you caught by the glandelinians, too?" asked Angeline Nichee eagerly. He gave her a glance that was somewhat reproachful.

"I believe I was mentioning the fact, young lady, when your desire to talk interrupted me." Said the boy. "I am not always careless in any of my actions, but the glandelinians everywhere were so busy looking for two girl scouts yesterday, that I thought I would see what the nearest column of rebels coming toward me was up to. So I came too near so near as to expose myself to their view my comrades following, and the glandelinians seeing me fired upon us and poured us so that we were all scattered. The glandelinians and I are natural enemies, and they would have captured me if one Angeline soldier had who had been out scouting had not come to my assistance and helped me to get away from the pursuing glandelinians, and far up into these woods, where they were seen by other rebels and shot down dead before my eyes and I narrowly escaping them."

"Why almost the same thing happened to us but in another way." Cried Angeline Nichee. "We were out in the river on a rowboat and a battle ship ran us down. Was you in any other section of the woods besides this one?"

"I have not had any time to examine any portion of the woods yet." Answered the boy scout. "But if the entire woods happen to be alike I can shudder at our fate, for the other portion of the woods I escaped from was like a prison, with no outlet except by means of sneaking or fighting your way through enemy scouting parties, ambushes, and hidden rebel camps and batteries and rifle pits. I stayed near here all night however and this morning, I plunged into the woods as far as I dared to go. I again encountered rebels, and they constantly fired at me, and bullets tore down leaves of trees about me and scrapped off the bark of trees now and then and some passed so close as to make me believe all was up with me, and I even while being pursued by the enemy, and being fired at barely escaped the folds of an enormous serpent which attacked me from a tree, but by and by I found my way to here after killing the python and saw you two girls. That's the whole story and as I see you have something to eat, I entreat you to give me a share of it. The truth is I am half starved."

With these words the boy, squatted down besides them. Very reluctantly, Gertrude drew out of one of her pockets some of the remaining blackberries and held them out. The boy promptly seized them in one of his hands, and began to eat them.

"We have not much to eat just now." Said said Gertrude Angeline. "But we are willing to share it with a war comrade in distress."

"That's right." Returned the boy scout looking at them in a cheerful manner, and then for a few minutes there was silence while they all ate of what was left of the berries and the fish. After a while Angeline Nichee said;

"I have never seen or heard of a boy scout who had so much adventure in one bright night and the morning followed following. Are there many of you still around?"

"We are rather few and even exclusive, I believe." Was the reply. "But we are so widely scattered by our enemies that it is hardly likely we will ever be united for a long time."

"What Christian camp did you come from?" Asked Gertrude Angeline. General Hanson's army.

"General Hanson's army."

"Where does it lie?"

"I don't know exactly where it lies I now because it was on the move when I went out scouting. You see also I and my friends who followed me have a restless manner for some reason or other, while all the rest of my race of boy scouts are quiet and contented and seldom stray far from our lines without the accompaniment of the dear old and brave Virginians. Ever since I joined the old regiments of boys and girls scouts, I had loved to go long distances to scout, even as near the enemy lines as possible although Violet and her sisters often warned me that I would get into unnecessary trouble by so doing."

"It is a big war, bigger than the world itself knows my friend" Violet hushed herself world any "and I have heard that the glandolinians war upon all living creatures no matter who they are, and if the glandolinians have as little respect for us as beautiful as we are, what respect would they have for you who are only a boy scout." This however instead of making me afraid naturally aroused my curiosity, and after I had completed my education, and left the boy scout school, I decided I would make one of the longest scouting tours in my life with a company of over fifty boys and try to get a glimpse of general Manley's army. I left the lines and even my regiment without saying good bye to any one, and now I shall always regret. Adventures were many I found. I sighed glandolinian armies, several times, been pursued a hundred times within one week, almost faced starvation, was lost on a desert once, and fell into a ravine, and had never been so close to being captured by a horde of wheeler glandolinians as I did then. I killed a young glandolinian wheeler about my size and secured his uniform coat which you see I have on. Also I had to fight my way through a good portion of these woods, for I met gigantic columns of glandolinians, some gargly a gargly garg oylan and goodler and also whimsie cavily, who not only pursued me, but hounded me like a dog, and every time they saw me attacked me fiercely. I got away once by threatening to shoot down the leader, and once also set fire to a small portion of the forest. Besides I was a long way escaping from general Manley and his generals themselves who took turns to pursue me when they observed my hiding place. In my wild rambling I finally lost my way and also lost all tracks or direction or distance, so that when I wanted to try and find my way back to my comrades I found I was alone, and lost in these woods and had no idea where any christian army or its camps might be located. I have now been trying to find it or one of them and it was during one of my flights through these woods, that I met a column of Growley wogs and was pursued for some seven miles before I got away." Gertrude and Angeline pichoo listened to this recital with much interest and awe, and from the friendly tone and harmless appearance of the boy scout, they judged that he was not likely to prove so disagreeable a companion, or an enemy as at first they had feared he might be. Perhaps the most curious thing about the designs on his captured uniform coat was the designs on its front, the white wheel, or what ought to have been a wheel. This queer arrangement of designs was however shaped like a wagon wheel, but having like fan like designs about it also. Gertrude Angeline and also Angeline pichoo knew something of the queer glandolinians called "wheolers" and she said: "I suppose you know the wheolers are pretty good horseback riders." "Yes indeed they are, the wheolers are or have the swiftest horses of any glandolinians known." "I don't see what good they are to their cause, they don't amount to anything, but only, raid, rape and commit massacres." "Remarked Angeline pichoo." "Well they are not what is said about them." "Admitted the boy." "But they are more dangerous than they appear to be and are worse than even the Gargoylians. Still I still taken altogether, I do not think any kind of glandolinian is any worse than the other. I have the opinion all are equally alike in cruelty, savagery wickedness and fury." Angeline pichoo did not like to reply to this, but Gertrude Angeline nodded gravely. "For a boy scout" "said she you are a wonder." "And I have never seen one before before who went through all you did and escaped the enemy." "Added Angeline pichoo." That seemed to please the boy, and he began walking around their position, making his way easily up the slope toward the woods above. While he was gone, Gertrude and Angeline took another good drink from the clear cold water of the river to wash down their breakfast, and then filled both their canteens. "Here here's a road, or an outlet from the woods or into it." "Exclaimed the boy from above." "We know" "said Angeline pichoo" "We found it last night." "Well then, let's go off." "Continued the boy scout." "The air also seems fresh and sweet, and it cannot lead us to any worse place than rebel encampment." The two girls got up and climbed up the embankment until they stood by the boy. "We had decided to explore the woods before you came" "Explained Gertrude Angeline." "But it is a dangerous place to navigate without being careful, so wait until I go ahead and scout a little."

"How much ammunition have you little girls got?" "Inquired the boy." "We will see in a minute." "Said Angeline pichoo." Gertrude looked over her belt, and then drew out her guns and the boy gave a startled jump and eyed the girls and their guns suspiciously, but the little girls proceeded to examine their weapons, and the action interested the boy very much. "Those guns" "he said rather nervously" "are valuable in a hole of this sort we are in. I did not think you girls carried weapons. The situation is not so very dangerous however I hope." "Sometimes we need our weapons more than anything else." "Answered Angeline pichoo" "but that is about the worse we can do--except to use out our ammunition, when you don't want to and we need it the most." Gertrude Angeline replaced the small revolvers and then went ahead for a certain distance the others following cautiously. The small roadway was not any too big for a party of travelers, but after they had gone a few feet, the pathway grew larger. Angeline pichoo came close behind her and the boy, took up the rear. "Seems like a regular foot path only." "muttered Gertrude who was cautious stopping along. For nearly an hour the three moved slowly along the path way, which made many twists and turns and sometimes slanted a little downwards and then upward and sometimes upward. Finally Gertrude stopped short turning the others back, having given a little exclamation of disappointment. "That's wrong" "Demanded Angeline pichoo, who could see nothing yet because of the thick foliage and vines of the forest and other growth." "We have come to the end of our travels in this direction, I guess" "she replied." "In the pathway blocked?" "Inquired the boy scout." "No it is worse than that." "Replied Gertrude sadly. "I'm on the edge of a vast but almost concealed glandolinian encampment and in a big clearing in the woods. We are even at the end of the woods and facing plains and meadows. Wait a minute and I'll move along and let you see for yourselves. Be careful Angeline, not to fall as we are at the edge of a high rise of ground and you may roll down the hill into the enemy's camp." Then she crept forward behind a tree and moved to one side, so the girl and the boy could follow. The boy came next and now all three knelt on the edge of a high but gentle slope which dropped down a long slant, and beyond there was a seemingly sea of tent barracks, and works of all kinds and smoking camp fires, extending so far that they could not determine the distance. "Hi!" "Said the boy scout, peering over the hill top from behind a tree" "This does not look very promising, I'll admit. But let me take one of your guns girls, and I'll take the chance and go ahead and see what the camp really is." "Aren't you afraid?" "Asked Angeline pichoo." "Certainly I'm afraid." "Responded the boy." "But if we intend to escape we can't stay here forever. As I notice you poor creatures are two girl friends of the civilian girls, it is my duty to aid you in every possible way, and to scout the camp for you. I won't enter it though never fear." Go Gertrude Angeline handed the boy one of her guns. The boy took it, and then went beyond the edge of the clearing and down the hillside for a certain distance until he reached a fallen log to which he hid down and hid. Suddenly the little girls heard a queer buzzing sound and a bullet almost hit Gertrude. Then right at the log she saw a puff of smoke as if there was an explosion, and a puff of smoke from the edge of the camp burst simultaneously. At first she thought the boy was firing on her and her friend, and drawing the fire on the enemy too but they decided to trust him and were more interested just then in following with their eyes a number of large puffs of smoke from the edge of a works. "I wonder how it did that happen." "Cried the boy as a geyser of smoke rose thirty yards in front of him. He quickly left his hiding place, and managed to reach the girls. "I guess you have drawn the fire of the enemy on you." "shouted Gertrude as he approached them. "hurry and fetch my gun here." "I can't see where you are hiding." "Said the boy." Go Gertrude and Angeline showed themselves and the boy reached them. "What made the enemy start firing?" "Asked he." "They must have seen you go to the log and hid behind it and tried to blow you up." "Said Angeline pichoo. "You must be more careful, careful what you do."

"What Glandelinian camp was it, and what was it like?" Inquired Gertrude Angeline.
 "I don't know yet, but there must be something about it, so I'll try it again!"
 "Again?" Cried Gertrude in surprise but the boy had boldly started out again and this time went forward more slowly carrying a branch of a tree before him to make it appear to be a bush. Then he slowly headed away to the left, and Gertrude and her companion came with interest. In a few minutes however, they saw him moving toward them and he made straight for them in the same cautious manner holding the branch behind him. He was only a few yards distant when suddenly a shell exploded in the air and the boy dropped the bush with a cry of pain, and next moment rushed forward and stood upon the point where the girls were.

"What's the matter?" Asked Angeline.
 "The fragment of a shell hit me." Wailed the boy showing his bleeding hand. "I don't like this kind of work I assure you. The Glandelinians began to train a gun upon me when I started back, my bush having failed to deceive them, and now they succeeded in getting me--a most unfriendly thing to do. Oh--oh oh. Ouch, what a wound."

"That's the nature of these Glandelinians, I'm sorry to say, and you took the chances." Explained Gertrude as she wrapped up his wound. "You have to be awful careful when you do any scouting work. But tell us what did you find?"
 "I found a way to continue our journey." Said the boy nursing tenderly the hand which had been wounded. Just beyond us out of sight of the enemy's camp is a bend of the river, at the shore of which are some launches which we can easily secure. I don't know where that section of the river leads to, but once we get into the boats we must follow it and find out."

"Why can't we get to it?" Protested the little girl. "We can't get beyond the enemy's lines out there in the open you must remember. We would draw a withering fire upon ourselves."

"No that is true." Replied the boy wisely. "But we need not go that way. At all we need to do is go back to the river by following the path. A path way and get to the river. Then follow the river northward until we find the boats."

"Are we strong enough to make such a long tramp through the woods?" Asked Gertrude Angeline doubtfully.

"Yes indeed we must need be." Was the reply.

"All right then let's go before they sent out men to investigate who you are!" said Angeline.

She looked over her own guns carefully and then the boy went toward the clearing to see if the enemy were coming.

"If the Glandelinians start to pursue before we get very far, it's good night and pleasant dreams." Said Gertrude.

"If they start to pursue, we can all fire shots at once and disconcert the enemy." Advised Angeline.

"Already for the start." Asked the boy seeing that no Glandelinians were coming from the camp.

"Yes let's start." Said Gertrude, with a tremble in her voice. The boy led Gertrude on the way. As she followed Angeline watched the woods and pathway behind her till the clearing disappeared in the far distance. She did not like to be left alone in these dangerous woods, with Glandelinians swarming all over, and with a big river a hundred feet below her, but she was a brave little girl, and was patient for anything. And I'm not sure many little girls would have cared to take the chances of going through those awful woods. Angeline knew or even Gertrude did not care for it themselves, but it had just had to be done, and so they did it as courageously as possible. Their hearts beat fast as they got deeper and deeper into the woods again and they were so nervous they could scarcely keep themselves from shaking or hold their weapons steady as they sped onward as fast as they could walk following the path way. It seemed as if a long walk to her, yet in reality they covered the distance in a wonderfully brief period of time and soon the little girls once more stood on the ledge of ground above the river. They were very glad to get to the river again, and both were grateful to the boy for his assistance.

"I think where this river may lead us to." Remarked the boy. "But it surely looks more promising that the woods we creep through or the enemy's encampment we come upon."

"Then our boy friend is rested?" Said Angeline. "We'll travel on and see what happens."

"Rested?" Cried the boy. "We need not think of resting now unless we want to be apprehended by pursuing rebels. I'm used to traveling days at a time without even once stopping except at night."

"Then let us move on." Proposed Gertrude. She still unconsciously held in her right hand one of her loaded pistols, so Gertrude put her own back in its holster knowing it was not necessary for two to carry guns at once. It may look suspicious. The river here was straight at the shore, and the ground above it was smooth and also had a path way and was very easy to walk through, so they made good progress. Gertrude and Angeline thought this path began about one mile from the place where they landed ashore in their swim in the river, but now it was impossible to guess any of the miles traveled for they walked steadily for hours and hours, without any change in their surroundings, except that the splendor of the woods grew, and the ground beyond became a maze of wild flowers and the like. Finally Gertrude Angeline stopped to rest.

"Here's something queer about this woods and the path along the edge of the river shore I'm certain." She declared waggling her head dolefully until her hair waved back and forth gracefully. "Here many miles we have probably gone already, and yet we come within no camp or anything now, and how long do we have to keep on traveling without finding something, no one knows."

"Could we not walk onward at night too?" Asked Angeline.

"The way seems safe enough." Was the reply. "But at night we cannot tell when we are likely to come to another rebel camp, or even to a precipice or cliff, or anything just as dangerous. In that case any of us who like to be killed by rebels now

"So we must keep on walking, and if anything happens

"I'll call out and warn you."

"That's a good idea." Declared Angeline. "I see, and Gertrude Angeline thought so too. So the boy scout started off ahead, quite in the advance it now beginning to grow dark, and hand in hand the two girls followed him. When they walked on in the way for a good long time the boy started picking berries and other things growing that was good to eat and the little girls seeing this started too. The boys boy found also some fine apples and some walnuts which he gave to the girls and then they sat down facing the river to eat.

"My feet hurts me." Grumbled the boy. "I'm not used to walking such long ways, and this ground passage at the edge of river and woods is so uneven and lumpy that it hurts me to walk upon it. I wish I had not lost my horse."

"Can't we find a horse?" Asked Angeline.

"No we cannot even ride one here." Said the boy.

After the meal was over they resumed the journey, which Angeline began to fear would never end in their finding the boats he had discovered. When Gertrude noticed how tired the little boy and even her girl companion were, she paused and lighted a match to look at her wrist watch.

"Why it is eight o'clock already." She exclaimed. "We have tramped all day long, and still we are no wiser near the bend of the river. Not knowing what is before us so well as we know what is behind us, I propose we make a stop now, and try to sleep until morning."

"What will you do about the horse?" Asked Angeline with a groan and the boy nodded.

"My feet are hurting me dreadfully now, and for the last few miles

I have been limping with pain."

"My foot hurt too." Said Angeline looking for a smooth place on the ground to sit down. "We have overworked our feet in the long tramp I guess."

"Ours perhaps." Said Gertrude who was very glad to sit down beside her companion. "We have got corns."

"Come," cried the boy. "Why Angelina you must think it strange to have corns at our age. Here hold the candle I lit while I look at the bottom of my foot. I declare!" He said everything then by the flickering light. "No wonder. I shoes were full of gravel and stones."

"Stones and gravel. Why so are my shoes," said Angelina pishoo.

"Then maybe we got them into our shoes while walking so steadily."

"It is possible," mused the boy. "but what ever the stones are or how they got in our shoes another such day walking on them, would have driven me crazy."

"I'm sure our feet will feel better by morning," said Gertrude Angelina encouraging pouring out a shower of earth, and gravel from her shoes. "Let's go to sleep and try to forget our sore feet."

The boy cast a reproachful look at the girl who did not see it. Then the boy asked plaintively:

"Do we eat now or do we starve?"

"We still have some berries which I gathered into my bonnet," answered Angelina pishoo opening her pink bonnet. "No one knows how long we will have to rove in these woods where there is nothing whatever to eat but berries and probably wild flowers, so I advise ourselves to save these berries until tomorrow."

"Give it to me now or some of it," demanded the boy. "If I'm going to starve, I'll do it all at once--not by degrees."

Angelina pishoo opened the bonnet and produced several handfuls of berries, and the hungry boy ate them in a trice. Gertrude was rather hungry, and whispered to Angelina pishoo that she would take part in her share, but the little girl secretly gave her her own berries, saving the other berries for a time of greater need.

Gertrude was beginning to get worried over her plight and that of her comrades and long before the girls were asleep the boy was watching over the river, trying to think of some way to escape from the region of the enemy. But after a time he also slept for walking all day long with stones and gravel in your shoes, was tiresome and painful, and there in the edge of the dark woods, slumbered the three brave adventures for many hours, until the boy aroused himself with the sun shining hotly and brightly in his face and then shook the girls.

"It's day time again," said he.

Gertrude Angelina arose, rubbed her eyes, and consulted her wrist watch.

"Nine thirty o'clock. Yes I guess it is daytime and we slept too long. Shall we go on?" he asked.

"Of course we should," replied the boy. "Unless this woods is different from every thing else in the world, and has no end along the river front, we will find a way out of it sooner or later."

The boy then gently awakened Angelina pishoo. "He felt much rested and refreshed by her long sleep, and sprang to her feet eagerly."

"Let's resume our way," was all she said.

They therefore resumed the journey, and had only taken a few steps when the scout companion cried:

"Wow!" and almost staggered back to upon the two little girls. The two girls who were following a short distance stopped abruptly for they had heard a sound of a shot.

"What's the matter?" asked the girls.

"We better look out," was the boy's reply. "I think we have come in the way of some glandolinian snipers." When while Gertrude drew her pistol the boy added "and if that is true, we need not have awakened so soon, for we were almost near this strange place when we went to sleep. I'm surprised glandolinian glandolinians did not come upon us in the dark and kill us."

Gertrude and Angelina came forward. A wall of trees faced them, and they saw that the pathway made a turn to the left. How ever they followed on but kept behind trees, and then went from tree to tree as cautiously as possible, and then made another turn this time to the right but did not see a single Glandolinian.

"Be careful we have struck the end of the trail," said the boy scout, in a pleased pleased voice. "We have struck the end of the trail."

They halted then they went the boats at last. A shaft of golden sunlight fell down upon them through the leaves of the tree tops almost at their feet, as Angelina pishoo and Gertrude Angelina turned the corner of the small passage or trail, and looking forward they found they were at the end of the trail alright, but they were far above the river and at the edge of a fifty foot precipice. And where the passage ended.

For a while they gazed in silence, at least two of them being filled with dismay at the sight. But the boy merely whistled softly and said cheerfully:

"I believe that this was the toughest journey I or you little girls ever had the misfortune to undertake, and for one I'm glad it is over. Yet unless I can manage to get down this steep embankment to the river below we are without hopes of securing the boats for I see them moored below."

"Do you think there is any way to get down?" asked Angelina pishoo anxiously; and Gertrude Angelina added a peering over. "It's a precipice, so I don't see how we can ever manage it."

"Well I'm an ordinary boy scout, and if I did not know how to make out anything I would not even make the attempt," said the boy scout. "But Violet and her sisters have learned no wonders, to be able to accomplish some wonders thanks to them, and whenever whenever you girls are ready I'll show you two a trick that is worth while."

"Oh," exclaimed Angelina pishoo. "Do you intend to climb down this precipice with hands and feet and expect us to do it too?"

"Why I should say not," answered the boy.

"I thought," said Gertrude. "that you would go first, and then secure a rope and cast up to us so we could climb down by it."

"Ropes are dangerous on this occasion but it is the only way," replied the boy. "and as I might not be able to find any cloth ropes I will have to make one out of vines. Besides it stands to reason that if I can get down a rope for a drop of only fifty feet, I can help you two girls down with me."

"Well I'm not afraid," said Angelina pishoo who longed to be as far away from her enemies as possible who no doubt were still on her trail.

"Suppose we fall to our deaths!" suggested Gertrude Gertrude Angelina, doubtfully.

"Why in that case for what I intend to do we three would fall together," returned the boy scout. "I'm going to make the rope out of the longest vines and then down we go."

"Soon the rope was made about eighty feet in length and the boy said:

"Gertrude tie the end of it to the strongest tree."

She obeyed and when she was finished the boy said:

"Grab one part of the rope as I do and start sliding down."

She obeyed and when she was half way down, Gertrude peered over the edge and inquired:

"How about me, Mr.?"

"Why I think it is best you grab hold of the rope after we are down first," was the reply. "The rope may not be strong enough to hold three at once."

Gertrude looked down toward the depths of the precipice and then looked at the slender vine for a rope and heaved a deep sigh.

"It's going to be some dangle I guess, but if we don't waste so much time on the way down or the rope holds my weight, I may be able to get down," said she. Soon the other two made the descent safely and then Gertrude grasped the rope firmly and held on for dear life as she started the descent. The rope was slimy but sticky but nevertheless Gertrude had to twin her legs around the rope to keep from sliding down too fast. Even in this position the brave girl had trouble in escaping the rough sides of the rock. Several times she exclaimed "Wow" as she accidentally bumped her arm against some jagged projection, or banged her knee, but she kept on nevertheless and got nearer and nearer to the beach. It seemed indeed a long climb yet almost before Gertrude realized it, she reached the ground below and a moment later alighted gently upon the ground. She released herself so suddenly from the rope however that she struck the earth with a shock that sent her rolling over head or heels over head, but by the time the other two reached her she was sitting up and looking around her with much satisfaction.

"It's sort of pretty here, especially the blue of the river," said she.
"Who such is a beautiful place if not torn by civil wars," cried Angeline Riches.

"I wonder where on earth we are, and I can't see the boats," pondered the boy, turning first one end of the rope and then another for sport. Stones and gravel there were plenty. But they found they had a walk of two miles along the shore of the river before they could reach the boats, but here there was no sign of enemies whatever.

"Just before I started down the rope I thought I had a glimpse of a movement not far away," said the boy. "I'm going back up and see if I was right." Then he climbed up the rope till he got to the top but when he reached the brink he saw nothing but the blue waves of the river in front of them, to the right of him, and at the left of him. Behind the hill was the forest that shut out the rest of the view.

"No descended and when he got down Angeline Riches said:

"I hope it is not a rebel camp."

"If it is we will have to avoid it," Gertrude replied.

"But even so it is better to take our chances out on the open water or along its beach than in those terrible unknown recesses of the woods," declared Riches.

"You are right little girl," agreed the boy as he said. "Anything on the water is better than the best of things that lies in a hidden unknown wood. So girls let us not quarrel with our fate, but be thankful we escaped the enemy so far."

"We are indeed thankful," the girls replied. "But I wonder if we can find anything to eat further on."

"Let us explore the beach for a distance and find out," Prop a proposed the boy scout. "Those trees growing on the lowest shore younger by the river beach seem to be cherry and other trees laden with fruit."

On the way to them the war explorers had to walk through a maze of rocks and stones or over them rather, and the boy scout who went first, stumbled and pitched forward on his face.

"Why it's a box full of bread lying among the rocks," cried Angeline Riches delightfully as she observed what had caused the boy scout to fall.

The boy arose to his feet, for he was not at all hurt, and examined the box.

Then opening the box more, he took the big jackknife that Gertrude Angeline offered him and cut one of the loaves in two. It was quite fresh and looked good, but the boy tasted it before he permitted the girls to eat any. Deciding it was good and safe, and not decayed, he gave her a big slice or a part of a loaf, and then offered Gertrude to help herself to what she found in the box. Gertrude looked through the box somewhat disdainfully at first, but when she had tasted the flavor of some cheese sandwiches she ate of it as heartily as did the others.

Among the rocks they discovered many other eatables, and Angeline Riches said gratefully:

"Well thanks be to God and His blessed Mother there is no danger of our starving, even if we are lost, and are fugitives of the enemy."

"These things must have been abandoned by some one in a hurry," said Gertrude.

"But anyhow we couldn't have struck anything better."

For walking for nearly half a mile they came to the trees that grew to the very edge of the river, where they obtained some of the fruit, and at the edge of the little forest were some wild plums. The forest itself which grew to the river's edge consisted entirely of nuts, walnuts, filberts, almonds and even chestnuts, and even apple trees, so there would be plenty of wholesome food for them to collect.

For their cutting down the river when they reached the boats which they saw only a few yards from the forest. The girls and also the boy decided to walk through the forest, to discover what was on the other side of it, but the boys feet were still so sore from walking on the stones in his shoes, that he decided he would not go through the woods in no direction but for the boats only and as he was obstinate to his decision they finally agreed after much argument with him. The forest here was not large at all, so by walking for fifteen minutes at a brisk walk they reached its furthest edge, and saw before them the boats near the shore of the river.

"Here are the two boats!" cried Angeline Riches with a sigh.
"Yes and they are pretty gasoline launches too," said Gertrude Angeline. "I guess if the worse comes to the worse, and if anything should happen in case the gasoline gave out we better make use of the paddles to use so we could paddle down the river. At least reserve the gasoline in case we are pursued by enemy craft." The other little girl and the boy brighto nod at this suggestion. When Angeline Riches' cheeks eyes lighted upon something else and she exclaimed "Is not that a man standing by the boats?"

The other two looked closely, saw a strange man by the boats.

"Looks like it Angeline," said Gertrude. "Not that I would call him much of a man from his appearance, but we better go over quickly and see that he does not go off with our boats."

Indeed a very few steps brought them to the man and the two boats. As our friends came nearer they observed a little old man dressed in a glandelinian uniform of a captain with a short gray beard, standing motionless by the boats and staring thoughtfully at the approaching party.

"Get away from here you christian dogs," he called in a fretful voice.

"Can't you see that you are obstructing yourselves?"

"Good morning," said the boy scout politely.

"It should not be a good morning for you christian dogs," snapped the little man who appeared to be a rebel indeed. "I've seen plenty of rebels in christian dogs in my day but none like you three intruders. So you call it fair to come upon me and poster me with your presence."

The three children were astonished to hear such words from a stranger even if he was a glandelinian when they had greeted quite properly, and the boy grew red at the rebels rudeness. But he said in a quiet tone of voice:

"Are you the man who owns these boats?"

"They are certainly my exclusive boats, and I'll thank you three fools to get out of here as soon as possible possible."

"We would like to do that and quick too," said Angeline Riches, and then to the man's surprise she and Gertrude and the boy leveled pistols at him and commanded him to push the boats half way into the water. The rebel officer obeyed, and also swore and protested but they were now too provoked to pay any attention to him.

"Nothing in sight sir," said Gertrude shading her eyes with her hand "so you will have to stay here for a time anyhow while we go off with the boats. It is not a bad place by any means and we desire to get to the christian lines."

"That's all you know about it," spoke in the rebel. "The river is infested by rebel scouts on boats as thick as bees, and the rivers current is rougher now than even it ought to be and you will never be able to swim if our comrades catch size you. I find you three fools are getting yourselves into greater peril than ever. The shore is lined with batteries, and you will be blinded by searchlights when it grows dark. If you two girls and your boy friend remain here, you will find things more satisfactory than on the river."

Angeline Riches turned to look at him, and her sweet face was grave and curious. "I wonder if you are telling the truth or fooling us!" she said.

"My name is Frank Pessimer," said he with an air of pride. "When the boy gave an explicit answer."

"What do you observe?" asked the girls.

"Everything was his reply. When he drew back with a startled exclamation and looked at some strange foot prints in the sand."

"Why good gracious me," he cried in distress.

"What's the matter now?" asked Gertrude Angeline.

"There has been many glandelinians around here and we are delaying time by arguing with this man. Don't you see them?"

"Here are not enough foot prints that I can see," said Angeline Riches examining the foot prints.

"Everything will be wrong with us if we don't hurry," insisted the boy. "If we don't get on our way we may meet a great calamity."

"I suppose you are right," admitted the little girls getting in the boats, and forcing the old man into one of them.

"Try to forget the nonsense and start on our journey down the river," advised Gertrude Angelina soothingly. "It's also beginning to rain. Let's get under the shot shelter of the boat curtains and keep dry."
"Butcher! Is it really starting to rain?" Asked the boy.
"It is," answered Gertrude as the big drops began to descend descend. "And I don't see any reason why I should stop it."
"No and we can't stop it if we wished to," said Gertrude. "Are you very hungry right now?" she asked of the glandelinian prisoner as she relieved him of his weapons and cartridge belt.

"I won't be after I get out in the middle of the river." Replied the rebel.
"When do me a favor please?" she said with a smile.
"Do you rob christian dogs a favor?" He demanded.
"Yes," repeated Gertrude also almost laughing.
"Well what is it, kidney?" He demanded.
"No not that. I wish you would be so kind as to take the umbrella in the boat which I just observed and hold it over the poor fishes in the river till it is at some nearing rain. I'm afraid they will get wet."
Angelina picked up the umbrella, and so did the boy, but the glandelinian realized the little girl was poking fun at him as he scooped upon the little girls in a way to show he was terribly peeved.
"Her soon had the boats out upon the water and tied to the other and although the rain was coming down in big drops they felt safe. The roof of the boats running protected them, and while they let the boat float of their will and watched the rainstorm. At once the boy scout saw a small rowboat with some one in it approach and he cried out:
"Go on in a rowboat. Some one in a row boat. The queerest rowboat I ever saw."

Gertrude Angelina and her friend and also the prisoner looked at it and Gertrude said in surprise:
"Dear me it's a little girl in the boat."
"That's what it is sure enough." Exclaimed Gertrude Angelina.
"Really the rowboat was not much bigger than a canoe and when it came toward the launches the girls recognized her right away.
"Why it is Angelina Jennings!" she cried.
"It's me all right," said the girl who was drenched to the skin. "But I was in an awful pickle just the same."
"What are you doing out here then in the rain?" Demanded Gertrude Angelina much amazed.
"I was pursued by the enemy and am lost." Replied the drenched creature.
"What's happened to you?" Asked the boy, leaning over the side of the launch in order to see the girl better and hear her. She was dressed as a boy, and had her hair tied up and was without a hat. "No him as she replied she seemed also pretty."

"You will remember that when General Hanson's army started on its march yesterday yesterday after the battle of Hagglandelinda I left them for a short while out through a wooded country just to see the scenery, and just as I got to the side of a forest, I was seen by rebels and pursued. I was hit in the leg by one of the rebels and I managed to dig out the bullet that was the size of a gooseberry. It is only a flesh wound however but I cannot hardly walk at all. I could feel myself growing weaker and weaker, and it frightened me terribly so that I decided to get into a row boat and allow myself to rest and the boat to carry me where it will until I was rescued. In a few minutes, I secured the boat and here I was. My wound is certainly a dreadful affliction. After I had recovered somewhat from the shock, and dug the bullet out and bandaged my wound, I saw your launches sweep out to the river and came to meet you and ask for help. It is not easy to find ones way in this mark caused by the rain but fortunately I spotted your boats here and came to you at once for assistance."
The boy and the two girls were much astonished at this story, and also felt grieved for the poor girl, and yet as they helped her onto the boat the rebel seemed to think it a good joke. He began laughing when he heard the story, and laughed until he choked choked, after which he lay down on the bottom of the boat, and rolled and laughed again, while the tears of excitement coursed down his wrinkled cheeks.

"Oh dear oh dear," he finally gasped, sitting up and wiping his eyes. "This is too rich." "It's almost too joyful to be true."
"I don't see anything funny about it." Replied Angelina, fished indignantly.
"You would if you had her experience," said the rebel, getting up on his feet, and gradually assuming a more assuming his former expression of face. "He saw the thing ought to be good to you."

"Oh it should." And how do you happen to fall into the river without getting wet?" Asked the girl as he suddenly gave him a shove and over he went into the water with a great splash.

"How did you come to be in part of the country?" Asked Gertrude as the man started swimming toward the shore and heaping appreciations upon them.

"I did not come here, the Glandelinians were here." He plied the third little girl, with a frown at the rebel's location. "The glandelinians who pursued me and tried to capture me said I was a spy, and trying to find out some information for the Angolishan general, and blamed me because of all the things the Vivian girls did, and because I was only a girl. So I had to flee in any old direction to escape the men. Around was it not?"

"Go on to me," said Gertrude Angelina. "Those glandelinians would pursue a hint if they could."

"Well," resumed Angelina, "I had when I found myself lost in the woods, I was obliged to live upon nuts and fruits, and I found many good fruits and nuts growing here here that I had never seen in my life before. I was hungry and therefore I had to eat them, and I found them wholesome and good. But one day as I was picking some blue berries and eating the same as I was hungry and could not find anything else—I suddenly saw a man a corner of the road a column of the forces of the rebels. It was a very unpleasant condition to meet with them suddenly and I became frightened but I hid behind a tree before the terrible glandelinians saw me. I could not walk very well on account of the wound I had received in my leg, and every thing in my way during the night I feared was a dangerous glandelinian soldier, every blade of grass their knives or snare, and every bush full of snipers. For several days I stumbled around in an agony of fear. Once a glandelinian rushed out at me from a bush and tried to run me through with a bayonet, but I hit him with a stone and escaped. I was frightfully scared and even if I ran for a moment from a hiding place night or day, I was still glandelinians of every kind swooped down upon me. Finally I became so scared that I decided to hunt for a better way across the river or even drown myself in anything to escape from the glandelinians. I was very tired and I was very hungry. At last I hid behind a small tree near the river bank and saw the row boat I was hoping for. Being wounded in the leg as I was and being unable to climb down a steep embankment, I was obliged to wait until I could regain a sense of my own composure and then I allowed myself to roll down the embankment even at the risk of rolling straight into the water. As soon as I got to the boat I got to my feet and got into it believing that if the glandelinians saw me now I would surely be taking a last view of the world. But to my surprise I was able to get out upon the water without detection and so I have finally seen your boats." They had all listened eagerly to this amazing tale and when it was finished the boy scout exclaimed:
"Do you think then that the glandelinians are getting as dangerous as all that?"

"I'm sure of it from my own experience." Answered Angelina Jennings.
"Do you know what direction Hanson's army might be on?" Asked Gertrude.

"I'm sure I can locate it." Answered the girl.
"Then direct us and we will go down the river at once." Begged Angelina.

"The glandelinians are in the water and are in terrible numbers." Answered Angelina Jennings, looking at her almost reproachfully.

"You girls are foolish as I am," said she. "Why in it we all go into such dangers for our own interest when the place of soldiers to do so?"

"Oh no it is our duty too as the glandelinians war on us." Gertrude assured her. "We must do out our duty for our good friends. So please direct us as we ask!"

The brave girl decided to do it, although she was rather reluctant to go down the river for she feared the glandulins would be there. She pointed to the north toward the northwest shore side of the river, and in a few minutes they started to paddle the boat. The boy using the oars taken from the row boat. As all the paddling for a few minutes remained silent as the boy rowed the boat, and her wounded leg pained her so at times that it was difficult for the girl to even remain at all. Gertrude Angeline who knew much about the treatment of wounds decided to look at her leg and asking Jo found she was to a better place proceeded to look the wound over.

"It's a bigger wound than I thought," said the girl, looking at the gash seriously.

"I hope you will be very careful of it," said Angelina, "John, and that is what Gertrude did. He cleaned out the wound as carefully and as gently as possible, and then tearing off a strip of cloth from her dress which was perfectly clean, covered the wound with some ointment she carried with her and then wrapped it up. You before she finished the work she could see that her friend was feeling much better, that the ointment was giving relief.

"Well, well what do you think of me now?" the wounded girl asked almost proudly.

"Your wounded leg is bad and will have to be treated as soon as we reach the Christian lines or find some good doctor somewhere," declared Gertrude. "You must be a poor ju dge of glandulins to risk an encounter with them." was Angelina's retort. "Any one can see that you are very reckless." "Well I could not help it." Asset asserted Angelina, "Nevertheless it is probable the same could have happened to you girls. But for the sake of my friend please, I'd like to know what good we all would be if we did not have adventures once in a while even what ever risk they may be."

"Never mind that," said Gertrude Angeline.

"I am a favorite of the Vivian girls, allow me to say, and you two girls are far from them," declared Angelina, "If you don't like the glandulins—and I'm sure you don't, for no one else does—why don't you go away from them and leave the rebels to themselves?"

"Well the Angulian generals need some one more spy than didlers, and soldiers can't get away from the glandulins like we can," declared Angelina, "Is that an answer?" "We don't want to encounter the glandulins not a single bit, but I don't see why we should be a coward just the same."

"We can all go back to Abbeville and be safe."

Gertrude Angeline shook her head, Angelina, John, shuddered, at the thought, and the boys all laughed aloud.

"You may be right in one way," the boy said to Angelina, "but we intend to do our work to suit ourselves ourselves, and if the glandulins don't like it let them take care of themselves then."

Angelina Jennings made no reply to this, although as the boy rowed the boat a little faster and Angelina began to paddle, the little girl's face wore an anxious and frightened look. Gertrude Angeline gathered some of the nuts she had brought ashore aboard the boat and also found a good bed in an opposite corner of the boat big enough to hold four men not on alone the three little girls. The boy decided to remain up all night, and then sleep during the day time while the girls rowed the boat though there was danger on the boat also they did not use them as their feet that evening consisted of fruits and nuts, picked from the trees, the weather was warm and there was nothing to cook. They rowed upon the water therefore for three days and nights without encountering any enemy of any sort, and rested and ate to their hearts' content and had some happy moments. Still they were not as happy as they wished to be because of being lost. Angelina Jennings felt miserable of her wounds, and she could see nothing good or admirable for every thing looked dangerous to her. On the fourth day a happy thought came to the boy's mind. They had all been raving, racking their brains for a possible way to land on a safe shore out of reach of glandulins and discussing this or that method, without finding a plan that was practical. Gertrude Angeline had said that they go into the middle of the river but it seemed too rough for such little launches on a windy day.

"And say now we did go to the middle of the river almost out of sight of land," said Angelina, "there would be liable to drift but o, and how long would it take us to get back to the shore where in case a storm would blow up?" Gertrude Angeline was forced to admit that she did not know. The boy could have left the boat to go back to the shore alone anything she wished to, but the boy was loyal to his new friends and refused to leave them unless they all were back to the church Christian mission. It was when Angelina, John urged him to go and find his way back to his comrades on the fourth morning, that the boy had his sudden happy thought.

"I will go nearer the shore and scout while in the boat," if you three girls will agree to take the chances too."

"We are not sure of it," said John, "I accidentally found us and yourself under fire in case glandulins are there." "Objection Angelina, John."

"You could suddenly get several rounds fired on for a long journey," acknowledged the boy, "but you know you have good weapons with you and might shoot down a number of your enemies."

Then upon quiet suggestion, startled the girls and they looked gravely at the boy's proposal while they considered it, but soon Gertrude Angeline asked, "But would you be of us if the glandulins would fire on our boats with artillery?" "We would not be such good to counsel us, if we were shattered into two or three pieces would it. Or if we were sinking on the water under fire and have grapes and auditors rip us to pieces. My friends, friend boy scout, I'd rather stay here in the river as far from the shore as possible, than be found by some one in places afterwards."

"Why couldn't you take with you some of the dark purple flags along with you we are taking on the bottom of the boat of course it and the glandulins would not then dare to fire." "I agreed the boy," when if there were too dangerous for us we could use the candles to see our way out to the middle of the water. We got to go around something you know to learn where we are."

"But it," declared Angelina, "clapped her hands with delight. "Let's do it Gertrude."

Gertrude or even Angelina, John did not like the idea at first, but the two girls thought it over carefully, and so the more they thought of it the better it seemed.

"How could we manage to find out whether they are friends or enemies if we go near the shore?" she asked.

"I could take this paddle and place a small Angulian flag on it and raise it high in the air," said the boy. "If the Angulians are near nothing will happen but if the glandulins are near they will fire on the flag."

"But we have not an Angulian flag with us," objected Angelina, "John."

The boy looked at her closely and then smiled.

"There is one kind of a flag below which you did not observe," he said presently. "At least you have a pink dress on, but Gertrude has on her a red ribbon, a yellow dress and a blue skirt. If she took the ribbon and put it on that white cloth here and tore off some strips of her skirt and dress she could make a false flag or one kind with the colors."

Gertrude looked at her skirt and skirt and saw it was true, with the large red ribbon she wore. If she tore off strips of her dress as he said she could easily make a false Angulian flag and the boat could be under as soon as they got near enough to the shore. So she first removed her ribbon and with some small pieces she had with her fastened it on top of the white cloth across like a trip of a flag. She then took off enough from her skirt to make the blue background for the flag, and then enough of the yellow skirt to make the stripes. She then tied the or fastened the artificial flag to the paddle so that it would not fall off when exposed in the air.

"I believe we will do it that way," she said.

Angelina, John ground but could not make no logical objection, except to her the plan seemed quite dangerous—and dangerous it was even then.

"But it is a safe plan," said Angelina, "John solemnly," but it is said nobody can stay alive without getting into danger sometimes, and danger does not always mean getting hurt, Gertrude, it only means we might get injured, so go I guess for our own sakes to get somewhere now this we will have to take the risk."

"I'm sure we will have trouble taking look over your eyes," said the boy. The little girl and nothing to Angelina. In her, she was sitting on her seat, staring at the sea like the old women of the river, but started at once to look carefully over their pistols. The boy remembered very well that the Glandelinians were, and though he did not wish to find that there was any, he the dangerous exploit he was undertaking he was not going to take any chances. Gertrude Angelina observed that her revolver was not as loaded as it should be as she had tried to shoot down the day before they got the boats so she got out from her belt enough bullets to fill the chambers.

"I guess my gun is four or five shots short," said Angelina. "I'm sure we have some excitement so might as well load our guns completely." So she loaded her gun properly. When Angelina pointed out they were about to make the dangerous attempt for sure she at first looked greatly scared. She was too interested in their experiment however, and willingly agreed to assist them, although she prophesied they would run into some unseen danger that was liable to be great, and he either drowned in the river, or a crushed to death by shell fire, or torn by graps. This unheeded prospect however did not disturb them, but it made the boy quite nervous.

"We will see to it the flag to use as a decoy is perfectly formed," said Angelina. "I hope, as she placed her gun behind on the ground, in such a manner that she could pick it up again in a hurry. Then she extended the artificial flag, and in a few seconds had disappeared. Then she placed beside her, as well as Gertrude did, their two guns within easy reach, and all preparations being made, Gertrude decided to make the daring exploit.

"I hope Gertrude you fastened the flag on tight," said Gertrude Angelina anxiously.

"Why the flag is not very heavy you know," he replied. "So I think the thick flag will hold, but be careful when you raise the paddle to not have your fingers exposed in case we are under fire."

"Ready for the start shout," said the boy.

"Yes the girls cried together, and Angelina. "I hope," said the boy.

"Be careful not to get reckless or our boat may be swamped by a rebel shell, or we would be killed outright, or be drowned, I'm sure you will." The boy now started rowing and rowed so hard that the boat shot through the water swiftly toward the shore pulling the other one with it. They now were going swiftly over the water toward the shore, at which lurked they knew not what dangers.

Gertrude Angelina and Angelina pointing a rode very comfortably in the swiftly speeding boat. The motion of the boat indeed was quite steady, yet they were both somewhat nervous about their future fate, when they got near the shore, and could not help wishing they were safe with in the Christian lines again.

"Look terribly worried, Gertrude," remarked Angelina. "I hope you are looking at her companion."

"Same with you, Riches dear," she said with a laugh. "But as long as we have our confidence in God and our trusty weapons with us we need not worry about our wicked Glandelinian enemies."

"In a dream," said Gertrude. "I would be curiousities in doing those same as to. But in reality, say out in this river--sailing toward an unknown section of its dreaded shores,--there ain't no word in any book or volume to describe our adventures."

"Why we are adventures, that's all," said the little girl.

The boat went onward for a time silently for they were several miles yet from shore. The slight swaying and rocking of the boat, made Gertrude Angelina drowsy, and she began to fall asleep. Angelina. "I hope," however awake, and after enduring the monotonous journey shoreward as long as she was able she called out:

"Are you near the shore yet, boys?"

"Not yet," answered. "It is in a wide river, and it takes some time to row so far you know, but if I keep on in a perfectly straight line, I'm sure to reach it some time."

"What indeed did seem to be a little reasonable, so the little girls in the launch remained as patient as possible, that in Gertrude dozed, and Angelina picked out what part of the river coast line they were likely to arrive at. For about thirty minutes after midday the boat flew on steadily, keeping to the straight line shoreward, the boy searching with his eyes the horizon of rapidly approaching land. Soon Gertrude Angelina was fast asleep asleep, and Angelina. "I hope," had laid her head on her shoulder to rest it, when suddenly the boy exclaimed:

"Here we are only half a mile from the land now."

"I think announcement they realized a round themselves. Gertrude Angelina stood up, and per pushing, aside the awning, went out to the boy.

"What does the land look like?" she inquired.

"Looks like it is safe to me," said the boy. "But I can judge it better in a minute or two when we get nearer."

"I don't care to have an encounter with the Glandelinians now if we can help it, since we had our recent experience," said Angelina. "I hope."

Soon the boy made another announcement.

"I see for sure a small encampment on the shore near the waters edge," said he.

"It's a Glandelinian camp so I won't stop there, because I see a clearer section of the shore straight south of it down the river."

"That's right," approved Gertrude Angelina shaking her head vigorously to get her hair out of her face. "The further away we are from a rebel camp the better it will suit us."

"It's about a mile away," said the boy. "I wonder if it can be Mauleys lines or general Federalists."

"I hope not," said Angelina. "I hope to Gertrude Angelina. "For I should not like to meet those Glandelinians just now."

After a few more minutes of rowing the boy called out in a loud voice:

"I can't get near the shore here at any point for I do not trust the looks of the series of encampments all along the line. It's also a shore line I have never seen before, although in my ramblings and scouting tours and the like I have wandered far and wide. It seems to be all camp fires, batteries of guns, and flickering lights and cities of tents all mixed up in a very puzzling way."

"Mostly the Angelinian encampments are like that," said Gertrude Angelina. "Are you going to try the exploit here?"

"Pretty soon," was the reply. "Here is a good scenery just ahead of me and we can display the flag before it gets too dark. What do you say to our going as near the shore as about three hundred yards?"

"I'll right alright," agreed Gertrude Angelina for both she and the other girls were getting tired of riding in a boat so long, and if there was a chance hoped to get foot on solid ground again. So in a few minutes the boy scout stopped rowing and then came to a stop so easily that they were scarcely jarred at all. Then he arose in his seat and looked for the flag, and then prepared to fasten it on the paddle. This proved to be a clumsy and difficult task and after much fumbling he finally said:

"I'm afraid I cannot put it on myself unless some one holds the paddle."

This was at first discouraging but after a little thought Gertrude Angelina said:

"If you don't mind Angelina dear, I can cut a small slit from your dress and make a stout string of it to tie around the pole with my knife."

"No," he replied. "he slit won't matter, cause I can either sew up my dress again, or get a new one anywhere or any how."

So Gertrude Angelina got out her big jackknife and after a considerable trouble managed to cut a slit of cloth from Angelina's dress. First she flattened it out and then she helped the boy to fasten the artificial flag to the paddle. They had carefully guarded this flag during the journey a shoreward by holding it between them for its use meant much to the brave little girls.

"I'm not very anxious to take the risk," said the little girl as she finally completed the flag fastenings. "But we need not worry about danger in this case. Anyhow it would be more dangerous to land on an uncertain shore than to test it out before we land."

the like taking medicine to make you well so we must manage to do what in the right thing somehow or other. The little girls were greatly relieved when the flag was finally fixed correctly on the pole, and Gertrude Angeline showed her satisfaction, for although they knew the effects on a flag like that if seen by rebels, they had not been sure whether it was a series of rebel camps and positions or not, or that the Lancelinians if there were any would think the flag a trick or something and not fire at all.

"Just shall we do in case we are suddenly under fire?" asked Angelina Pichee, as she picked up her gun, marveling that she had ever been able to know how to use one. "They may be handy too you know."

"I'm not sure as that," Gertrude replied, "but if the Lancelinians fire on us we won't remain here that is one thing. Their fire of course in the dark night not have any effect on our boats at all but then contrariwise they might. I heard of an experience like this once of two soldiers and one of their boats got badly damaged. But in case of pursuit the two guns of ours will come handy."

Gertrude now searched her pocket and drew out a small tin wooden box with a sliding cover. The little girl had kept an assortment of small bullets of various sizes in this little box, but these she now dumped loosely into her pocket, and in the box placed from a small bag a little black powder and filled it up. When this important matter was attended to they found time to look about them and see what sort of an onslaught it was that was within their view before they would order the boy to raise the flag pole up high.

The shore of which they now were observing preparatory to their exploit was not a barren waste very much forested, but had on its side patches of green grass, a large number of trees in scattered groups, and here and there vast camps and camp fires innumerable but in a straight line. The sides of the slope up from the river seemed rather steep as elsewhere encountered, but with care one could climb up and down with ease and safety. The view up the river from the boat showed pleasant scenes and even fertile hills lying a little beyond the encampments on the shore. Gertrude thought she saw a line of houses of queer shape scattered all out in the rear of the most nearest camps, and there were moving dots that might be swarms of soldiers, yet were too far away for her to see them very clearly. She had raised the flag as high as possible, and received no response from the camp. He did it a number of times with the same results. Not far from the shore line which they viewed was a rise of ground which he thought he saw the outline of a battery of guns, so the boy proposed to, a land carefully, and would scout and see what was there.

"That's a good idea but be careful," said Angelina Jennings. "Cause it is getting toward night time, and if we have ourselves before us we will have to get from the shore and out into the river again."

The boy left the boat, and went on shore and had been gone for nearly ten minutes, when they saw him appear on the edge of the top which was nearest them, and then he descended toward the boat.

He got in and said:

"Go to a go on. We are facing the army of general Tamarlin's forces, unarmament. They don't observe our boat, and lucky it is too far they have a batt ery close by which could have shot us out of the water."

So the little girls went inside the covering above the boat, and the boy, began to row the boat again and it did not take him long to get a certain distance from the shore. From a further distance their first view of the Lancelinian position pleased them very much. It was wider than any of them had ever guessed. In the very centre stood a vast fortress built of stone, but very neatly constructed. The Lancelinians were in sight along the shore, but several searchlight were beginning to make their display and a long line of camp fires were seen all along the shore, so with one accord the little girls stood on the bulwarks of the boat watching the strange scene.

"I wonder," said Angelina Pichee, "in what part of the Calvernia country we are and if we are very far from any Christian army."

"Can't say as to that, partner," answered the boy scout. "But I am mighty certain that we have come a long way since you girls had the adventure with the rebel warship."

"Yes," he agreed with a sigh. "It must be many, many miles."

"Distances don't mean nothing," said the boy. "I have rowed boats, rode horses, and walked on a scummy turn or pretty much over all of the war sections of the Calvernia country trying to find one Christian army after another in my ramblings and it is astonishing how many perils are hidden away for you in the crack and corners of this big globe of earth. If one travels for adventure, he may either find something new at every turn, or every kind of peril whether he wants to meet it or not, and a good many books could have been written of our adventures too."

"Perhaps this is one of the adventures," suggested Gertrude Angeline with a smile. They stopped the boat now for a few minutes and being nearer the shore looked at it closely. A camp fire glowed suddenly more brightly making the scenery on the shore look weird.

"We had better come in and not be out here too long, or for it looks as if some one on the camp was stirring," said the boy. "I don't like the notion of that dimly lighted getting too dark for the rebels to see us or the boat now." said Angelina Pichee. "So we can't be having any trouble yet."

"You will change your mind about that in a little while if you don't take care," declared the boy. "I know what a sudden stir stirring of a rebel camp fire means, and it feels to me as if our boat has been observed and the one we have with it too and it looks as if trouble was coming our way. But make your own will at it girls. But anyhow let's have a little supper." "Supper."

Inside the boat there was one large room, simply but comfortably furnished. It had a small bench and a table. The boy had brought something from the shore, two chickens he had captured and some thing else and a those having been a cooked before he secured them from a rebel camp fire on the shore, the girls seated them selves upon the benches except the boy, who waited upon them first.

"May I ask what section of the Lancelinian army it is?" inquired Gertrude Angeline.

"Goodness no don't you just remember having me tell you?" asked the boy looking at the girl in surprise.

"I admitted Gertrude Angeline truthfully. "You spoke something to Angelina Pichee but I did not make it out."

"Well what ever camp it is we have lost our way," said the boy.

"Not exactly," said Gertrude. "We did not have anything to lose but ourselves."

"Ah," said the boy nodding his head as he saw her joke. "This," he announced as a part of general Raymond Richardson's Federal army under Tamarlin's famous Lancelinian Lancelinian army."

"Oh," exclaimed Gertrude and the other girls in one breath. "But never having heard of general Richardson's army they were no wiser than before."

"I thought that would startle you," remarked the boy, well pleased, as he now sat down and began to eat. The girls watched him in silence and then Gertrude asked:

"May I ask what may be your name?"

"He" answered the boy scout. "Haven't you ever heard of me? I'm known far and wide as Gerald Starring."

They all received this information in silence at first for they were trying to think what he could mean for they did hear of a boy by the name of Gerald Starring before, the famous hero of the Lancelinian girls. Finally Angelina Pichee mustered up courage to ask:

"Is your name really Gerald Starring?"

For answer the boy turned around and faced them with a smile.

"I have no other name," he said. "Unless I invite one. You can call me a wheel boy if you like."

Gertrude laughed softly and Angelina Pichee whistled softly to herself, and Angelina Jennings made up her mind that it must be true. She had heard much of the boy friend of the Lancelinian girls called Gerald Starring and she had now to have him with her for a trip. The boy however seemed satisfied that he had explained his position fully and presently he placed four plates upon the table, and taking a large box from the floor poured its contents on each of the plates. The little girls at once approached the table again for they were still hungry but when they had examined their plates one of the little girls exclaimed:

"Why they are big red strawberries."

"To be sure they are." Returned Gerald Starring with a pleasant smile. "Eat them quick and if you want more I have plenty." With this he seized a spoon and began eating them with out any sugar, while the others looked at him in astonishment.

"Did anyone give them to you?" Asked Angelino. "Ishoo."

"No indeed." Said he. "Why don't you eat them? Are you not hungry?"

"Yes indeed," he replied. "I am hungry, but we don't know what to make of this. Where did you get these lovely berries. In the woods?"

"Aha, ha," laughed the boy. "What a funny idea. Where in the world did you girls come from that you don't know where I got the berries?"

"Abbisamin." She said.

"Abbisamin. I've heard of Abbisamin but I never before behold a real Abbisaminian."

"Where did you get the berries?" Asked Gertrude.

"Where I got them isn't worth talking about," declared the boy helping himself again to a plateful for he had been eating a little the time he talked.

"For my part," sighed Gertrude Angelino. "I'd like to know where you managed to get those berries, just by way of variety."

"Why the enemy just handed them over to me without question. He answered, and then rather bashfully, as he did not like to talk about himself, he told how when he landed on the shore, he raided a camp of the enemy unseen, and brought to the boat, strawberries, two loaves, of bread, three whole hams, canned peaches and the like, rather a full store."

"You certainly are a wonder," said Angelino. "In ishoo. who had ate her berries up. A little later she helped herself to a little more. They finally finished as many strawberries as they could eat, and now the boy was greatly amazed at the way the little girls could eat so many berries without getting sick. But he had also condescended to eat about three full plates of berries, and Angelino Jennings ate several, while Gertrude ate four, and Angelino ishoo two. Gertrude was the last to finish eating berries and then asked for a drink of water.

"Water?" Asked the boy. "Why I have something better. I and he gave them each a bottle of soda pop.

"Did the enemy give those to you too?" Asked Angelino. "Ishoo laughing."

"Not exactly that I heard of," said he. "I usually take things from enemies like the glandolinians whether they give them to me or not. But also after a while I can give you some fresh lemonade. I took them along with me too."

"Oh did you get lemonade too?" she inquired.

"I certainly did, and it is refreshing and healthful."

With this he brought forth the bottles and the girls from it very nice lemonade. The boy liked it too. The adventures of the girls however had made them a tired and hungry that all they ate that night did not make them sick but made them rather drowsy, and while the boy started the boat slowly out to the river the little girls rolled themselves in some blankets and lay down on the cot and went to sleep. Angelino ishoo awakened several times, and found the boy always alert and listening intently for the slightest sound as he paddled softly. But the little girl could hear no sound whatever in any direction at all except the lapping of the waves, and the noise of birds in the sky.

"Wake up--wake up, girls." Called the boy scout. "Didn't I tell you the enemy had seen our boats and were suspicious. I can hear their firing and a number of their boats are now on shore after us and their rifles are at firing level at us."

"Is it true?" Said Angelino. "Ishoo rubbed her eyes and creeping out of her blanket. "It is the first time in my life that I ever knew the glandolinians could discover us in the night time."

"Well they have and for that reason a reason we got our heaviest experience right here."

The little girl went outside to see if he was true. The air was filled with many strange lights, and the shore lined with them, and it seemed also as if their river in their rear was filled with pursuing boat loads of men, the boats being so large in size and so queer in form that she was puzzled.

"Are you certain they are really glandolinians pursuing us?" she asked.

"To be sure. I must get my own weapons which I secured in my raid and turn out to resist them if they come too close. Would you girls like to resist them or would you rather make a swift retreat?"

"Yes we will endeavor to get away first and then fight if not successful."

He then followed the boy to the stern. When she exclaimed;

"By the glandolinians are not firing a bit."

"Of course, not now they aren't," replied the boy scout. "They were firing not many minutes ago but when we did not answer them they ceased."

Angelino ishoo went inside her room and gathered pistols and placed them in their holsters.

"By our pursuers are Turnamunians," she cried.

"Certainly; all of those glandolinians are Turnamunians. What do you girls expect the glandolinians to be."

"It is the first time I ever saw the Turnamunians."

"Well it is the first time I ever saw the Turnamunians too so we may as well make the best of it," said he, a little impatiently. "I'm not responsible for the absurd glandolinian rebels have in their minds, and when we are pursued we are supposed to do as they are pursued done rather than kind of glandolinians there are. Don't shoot at them now though for the only fault I find with the Turnamunians is that if they are aroused they never miss."

With this the boy scout set to work paddling as fast as he could and he was so quick and industrious that he soon had begun to outdistance the glandolinian pursuers keeping close however to the nearest shore banks on either side of the river.

While he rowed the little girl decided to have a look at the gasoline engine, and found it in good condition, and plenty of gasoline in cans too. Gertrude Angelino also having been aroused came out and joined her.

"What's all this row?" she asked of Angelino. "And why are you looking at the gasoline engine?"

"The glandolinians are pursuing us in boats," said she. "But I'm not sure whether they are real Turnamunians or not, although they are light in the sky moving back and forth, and on the shore look suspicious. It's dangerous however to take chances and so if the pursuers gain on us we will have to use the gasoline engine. Gertrude Angelino looked at the machinery and then to the rear and saw the many boats in the distance coming forward, the men rowing as hard as they could. Then Angelino Jennings came out and looked too. Her time the glandolinian pursuers seemed to be gaining no nearer and yet not even being left behind and there were so many of the boats that the number of them seemed to darken the river. The boy himself was now rowing a little harder but suddenly Angelino ishoo heard him call out; also ran to the part of the boat he pointed with her pistol in her hand, and the other two quickly followed and saw some object apparently waiting through the water on a swiftly as possible. Here the river did not seem to be so awful deep and as the object came nearer they saw it appeared to be a boy or something.

"Goodness gracious; here is some one swimming swiftly toward the water."

"Now we saw one has been lost or fallen into the river and does not know how to get out and may be drowned," said Gertrude. "I hope we can rescue the poor boy. Let's get nearer and pull him out and see."

She managed to row the boat nearer and then took half hold of one arm, while the boy took hold of the other. Then they both pulled and out from the water came what indeed appeared to be a little boy. He was dressed in a gray velvet jacket, and knickerbockers, with grayish brown stockings, buckled shoes, and a blue gray shirtwaist, that had glandolinian dandy nod frills down in its front. When drawn from the water the little boy was gasping and vomiting water from her himself and both his hands were scratched and slightly maimed. At first he could not speak to his rescuers but lay quite still in the bottom of the boat and eyed them calmly.

"Up till he had recovered somewhat," then he said; "at my cap which I know is floating near the boat." While Gerald Starring fished into the river for the lost cap, Gertrude and Angeline picked up the boy, joyful, and Angeline's countenance had a smile on her face. The boy looked from one to another and asked;

"Who is this little boy?" "Why is this Jennie Urner, of course," answered Angeline. "If any one ever finds an apparently lost boy or one in trouble of her looks he can make up his mind it's Jennie Urner, our little amazon friend as we call her. But how she ever came to be found swimming in this river is more than I can make out."

"Where does she belong?" Inquired Gerald Starring. "Her home is in Galverhula or Abidjan, I think, but I'm quite sure that she does not belong anywhere at present but General Conscientious Aronburg's army." "What's right," said the little girl nodding her head as she got up or sat up.

"Everyone has to be, belong belong somewhere," remarked the boy scout. "Not so though," insisted Jennie Urner. "I'm half way around the world, from my own home I assure you, and I have lost my two pistols, and my own mind almost from the experience I had with the enemy before you took me out of the water. Stand to reason it was not your boats they were pursuing, but me, but now since I'm safe with you I don't care much. This is a pretty good country Angeline dear. I've had lots of fun with the enemy here since the war began." By this time the boy had secured the little girl's cap and was listening to the conversation with much interest.

"It seems you know the little girl dressed in boys clothes," he said. "You indeed I do," answered Angeline. "We made a journey once all over Galverhula together, once with the enemy after us every day and night, either on water or shore, and were good friends. We went through several caverns also, from exit to exit and had the enemy on our trail ever since."

"Well then I'm glad I saved her life," said the boy. "But the glandolinian boats seem to have stopped following and are looking around."

"Much obliged, Gerald Starring," said Jennie Urner to his evident surprise, sitting up and staring at the boy. "But I don't believe you have saved anything except only me. It is nice and warm to night, but unless you want to make it warmer for us remain here. What makes of boat is this, and what makes you only want to row when you have a gasoline engine in the boat."

"As for the latter reason we have only enough gasoline for a spin of three miles," replied Gertrude Angeline, looking at the engine with evident dismay.

"All right," said the girl, and having gotten to her feet, and recovered her composure began looking at the engine. The enemy it seemed had stopped pursuing, now some of the boats were going back, or were gathering in a mass along the shore bank the glandolinians evidently not having seen the true ones as they happened to be painted of a black color which was fortunate to the little girls and the boy or they would never have assumed there were boats of every size, and color, most of them having gorgeous colors at their sterns.

"Just look at the number of boats," exclaimed the boy scout scornfully. "Are not those Turnerian dreadful creatures, their hats all covered with feathers?"

"I think they are beautiful," said Angeline. "Look at her in a manner as if he was going to eat her up."

"If you think they are beautiful then," he retorted. "Why don't you join ranks with them?"

She did not answer. However this gave Gertrude Angeline an idea. She felt in her pocket and drew out several pieces of stout string. She then let herself down into the water very quietly, so as not to make any noise and alarm the glandolinians who were now going ashore, but crept up to several of the boats, the biggest and nearest ones and tied the cords to the or around their rudders, thus making them impossible to be steered if the rebels should use them again. She scolded several others of the nearest boats, by boring holes in them and the glandolinians who had went back on shore were so intent on their own duties, that they did not notice a boat was happening to their boats, and when she had managed to scuddle or work weak, and disable about twenty of them she tied all the ends of the strings together, and fastened them to another boat so they all would be held at once. The others on the land much watched Gertrude's action with much curiosity and alarm.

Then she returned to the boat.

"The glandolinians will be quiet until they have discovered the condition of some of their big out boats," she said. "But then they will want to use them. When they see their boats scuddled and tied up they will be in confusion."

"Tell me Gertrude what will the glandolinians do then?"

"It may worry them a little," replied Gertrude. "But they are not going to be hurt and it will enable us to take it easy and save as much gasoline as possible. At least when the boat was again allowed to go further out in the river our friends made for themselves a good breakfast, and then the boy started to row the boat again."

Jennie Urner stood beside Angeline, picked up and held her hand in hers, because they were old friends and liked the little girl very much. Jennie Urner was not quite so old as Gertrude. Angeline, and tall as she was, he was half a head shorter than Angeline. Jennie in height. Then out remarkable thing also about Gerald Starring was that he was always quiet and composed, whatever happened, and nothing was able to astonish him. Gertrude Angeline and the other girls liked him because he was not rude like many other boys in our country are, and never tried to plague any girl or girls whatever, (except they were his enemies). Gertrude Angeline liked him because she had found the boy cheerful and brave at all times, and willing to do anything she was asked to do. When they got out to the middle of the river, Angeline picked up the air and asked;

"Don't I smell smoke perfume?"

"I think you do," said the boy. "You smell something like violets, and that proves that the enemy may be burning flowers for some reason or other. All the wind and breeze broozes on this river is always pure and sometimes is perfumed from the flowers growing at many places on shore, and for that reason I am glad to have some perfume brooze. The south breeze has always a violet odor, something to scented mingled with the fragrance of wild roses or lilies of the Valley or lilies blossoms go we need no perfume bottle as just now though of course I wish I had one. But now let's see where we are."

Inside the boat the girls examined the gas gasoline engine properly.

"Which way does the propeller spin?" Asked Angeline Jennings.

"Either way we want the boat to go, forwards, or backwards," said Gertrude.

Angeline Jennings put out her hand and tried to spin it.

"Don't do that," exclaimed Gertrude.

"Why not?" Inquired Angeline Jennings.

"Because it happens to be that we will start the engine unnecessarily, and we got to reserve the gas for an emergency."

"Let's go and all row the boat," proposed Angeline Jennings.

"Not now," said Gertrude. "I appreciate your intense interest in our escaping the enemy, which we fully deserve to do, but we only all row when it is necessary, and if we got started we might not be able to stop."

"What would do me?" remarked Jennie Turner. "Go ask your friend Gertrude; how are we going to get away from this region of the enemy?"

"Get away from this region?" exclaimed Angelina Jennings. "Why we don't know. Why we won't find anything nearer than a long ride on the river."

"Have you ever been on the river a very long time before, Jennings?"

"No I can't say that I have," admitted the girl.

"Then permit me Jennings dear to say you are no judge," declared A Jennie Turner.

"But you have not answered my question Gertrude Angeline dear. How are we to get out of the region of the enemy?"

Gertrude reflected for a while before she answered.

"We might be able to find our way to some a bristling camp later on," said she.

"But just now the problem you ask is no more than I can manage to think of, although we ourselves have been fugitives already for three days or more. We ought not to have gone into the river in the first place, especially northward."

"Perhaps we did make a mistake at that," Angelina, indeed, acknowledged.

"At least when we did go out on our scouting tour we ought to have brought with us a full regiment of boy scouts, instead of us two going alone," suggested Angelina, indeed, regretfully.

Gertrude Angelina did not make any reply to the statement, which showed she did not fully agree with her little girl's friend, but she fell into deep thought, with much wrinkled brow, and finally she said:

"If we could take the chances of making another gasoline engine go now, we could probably find our way out of our troubles."

They did not understand this speech and looked at Gertrude as if expecting her to explain what she meant. Just then a chorus of shrill cries arose from the outside.

"Here you! Gladiolians! Let me go—let me go!" the voices said. "Why are we insulted in this way? Hey you Christian people in those boats come and help us!"

Gertrude and Angelina indeed ran out to the outer part of the boat and looked shoreward.

"Some boys are caught by the Gladiolians near the boats, Gertrude," he said. "I did not know we would have another adventure so soon."

"Oh yes it is most likely to happen," said Gertrude drawing her pistol. "When she looked at the others anxiously and added 'Let's get to their rescue.'"

The boys however had managed to escape from the Gladiolians of their own accord and had swam to the boat. They were helped into the boat and one of the boys said:

"Listen to me girls, and at once they became still. "We three boys who are strangers in your boat want to get to some near Christ's army, and as we make an addition to your force we want you to help us get there. You know we are asking a very great favor, in quite the fact you rescued us, but it's the only way we can think of—except to help you do it. We are going out shots and it is too much to enter take a long and tiresome journey. Now tell me which of you girls will consent to do the favor we ask."

The girls looked at each other as if greatly astonished. When Gertrude replied:

"You boys surely must be a crazy. Not one of us is capable to let our own way to a near Christian army, with even the smallest of our party."

"I'll fix the matter of that," proclaimed the boys. "If you will agree with me, I'll help you through all your adventures, so it won't worry you a bit."

The girl heroines considered this gravely. Living in a war torn country, they had no doubt that but that the boys could do what they said. After a while one of the girls Jennie Turner asked:

"If we help you along will you three boys be our companions always?"

"We certainly will," replied one of them.

The girls then chattered a while while the boys went on rowing like mad with their boats porpoising like and then Gertrude said:

"We'll agree. Now she questioned the three boys as she found they were quite young. They were strong, brave boys however, with clear brave eyes, and the little girls decided they were the best looking boys they had ever seen, and at first believed they must be some of the Gladiolians' boys trying to test their knowledge. The three boys were given something to eat and they were all pleased indeed.

Gertrude now took from her pocket the wooden box with the ribbon on it and looking it over returned it to the place. The boys snatched around with pride, highly pleased with their bit of some help.

"I don't see though," said Angelina, "in how do I help?" they were going to undertake the rebel persons without an encounter unless we use the ribbon."

"We are not being evasive yet," answered Gertrude Angelina. "And don't you see my trick. We are not being pursued. We are taking the one twenty boats with us." They saw it was too late. Gertrude then looked in the boat for some rope she had seen lying on its bottom, and not finding it she neverthless took some old clothes she saw and cut the cloth into strips or strips and twined twisted it so it was almost as strong as ropes. With this material she attached attached to the boats around the launches as a sort of protection from persons, a net or support and soon going from one boat to another had bound them together until they were on a raft of boats. This extra load made it hard for the boys to row, so the engine was now in an operation and when all this had been arranged, one of the three boys the oldest asked:

"Where do you wish to go?"

"Why just follow the shore line and observe what you see that may be safe for us to make a landing," said Gertrude. "A rebel encampment is not along the whole river, you know but only for a certain extent. The boy who was rowing is our leader, and wherever he decides to go we go, and wherever he lands you land. Is that satisfactory?"

The boys declared it was indeed quite satisfactory, so the girl took a small with her other friends.

"On our way down the river since we rescued the three boys," said Gertrude staring. "I noticed a bare expanse of forest without any signs of living thing."

"Then we had better look away from such a shore," replied Gertrude.

"Not so," insisted the boy. "I have found on my travel no far that the most pleasant trip would be made in the one woods, so I think it would be wise for us to land and take a trip through these woods and discover what lies beyond it. For in the direction we are going for we will soon reach the river mouth, probably another hour or so as we will then and beyond that in the ocean and we don't want to make an ocean trip in a launch. I saw also a little beyond the woods when I stood up a broad expanse of plain, and on the other a movement of some kind with blue tents. For my part I vote for the forest I spoke of. We are passing it now."

"Just do you say, partner dear!" said a deep-voiced Gertrude Angeline.

"It is all the same to me," she replied.

No one thought of asking any one else's opinion so it was decided to abandon the boats and make a trip through the woods. So soon they landed and then they started through the woods following the wake of their boy leader. Gertrude Angeline and her girl and boy friends found these conditions of these woods more comfortable and safer than they had expected, although there was a strong wind rising that made the branches of the trees sway threateningly. The boys were in the lead, and the girls followed the boys out trailing behind them. It seemed to be quite an important procession but fortunately there was no Gladiolian around to see it.

For the girls and the boy had headed straight for the distant encampment the boy scout had spoken about and a few minutes after starting they were going over a broad expanse of ground covered with thick grass. It looked like a region with may have been so heavily under fire once that it no living thing could have lived for shell craters dotted the plain like a honey comb of a hive of bees. The little girls thought to themselves that this would be a bad place for the men to be in case they would have been under the same shell storm, or to even lose strength, or to fall into one of the shell craters, or for rebels to suddenly come upon them from seemingly no where, and they felt like giving way several times and go back to the woods, and indeed they could not help feeling a trifle nervous and fidgety, but nevertheless they had confidence in their boy friends and also in God as well as their own caution and knowledge. It was indeed a remarkably big plain.

There was nothing to relieve the monotony of view but the distant forest line, and the small craters and fumeroles and no more nervous did they feel, that every minute seemed an hour, and an hour a day. Pleasant fumes or odors seemed to rise from the deep chert pits which would have probably been deadly to the living, travelers had not there been a strong breeze blowing. They lay down into one of the small craters and saw a heap of half-dead bodies of dead soldiers. As it was the little girls were beginning to feel sick, when a breath of fresher air filled their nostrils and on looking ahead they saw great clouds of white mist or what appeared to be smoke. Even while they wondered what it could be the boys had plunged boldly into the vapor and the others followed. They could see nothing for a time and felt sure they would stumble into one of the small craters with out seeing it, but never before nevertheless they kept on steadily and as steadily as ever and in a few minutes they left the strange mist behind, and beyond the plains the little girls saw a beautiful landscape spread out before them, extending as far as their eyes could reach, but there was no movement of any kind in sight. They also saw bits of beautiful forests, verdure clothed hills, fields of barley, but half-burned grain, mountains, and small oases and bridges and throughout the scene were scattered groups of pretty towns, but no general movements. Over all this delightful Galvordian land some-where from their high perch on the hill top they had mounted seemed better than a magnificently painted picture--was a rosy glow much as we sometimes see in the west at sunset, but in this case it was not in the west only, but everywhere all along every horizon and they wondered exceedingly what it could mean. No wonder the boy soon paused to look over the scene, the other boys followed his action, all exclaiming the necessary with equal delight. Then as with one accord, the four boys formed a group and slowly started down the hill side followed by the little girls.

They soon reached the foot of the hill and it was just as pretty here as elsewhere, and the boys halted. "Oh Gertrude don't do that! This is not a dud. Exclaimed Angeline Nichols rapidly. "How lucky we were to discover this beautiful country." "This country seems to be rather high class, I'll admit." And Nicholas replied Gertrude Angeline looks looking around her. "But we don't know yet, whether a Glendalban army is here or not, or what its people are like. I don't see how such scenery occurred the desolation of the war at that." "No one could live in such a beautiful country scene without being happy and also good--I'm sure of that." Angeline Nichols said earnestly. "Don't you think so Gerald?"

"I'm not thinking just now," answered the little boy. "I know it isn't so, and we never gain anything by jumping into conclusions. When we see the kind of people who live or here or the scenes and their camps we may encounter we will have what they are like, and no amount of thinking will make them any different. But I'll bet you one thing, and that is we are not in Galvordia." "That seems true enough," said the boy scout leader Gerald Starr. "But now I want to make a proposal. While we are getting acquainted with this strange and new country scenery, which looks as if it contains everything to make one a happy, and escape the ravages of the war, I would like, to scout alone, all by myself and see if I can find it safe for us to travel on. If I do I will come and tell you. But if I fail to find any safety, I will immediately return to you with a warning for I must do anything in my power to protect you. You and the other boys may go on, and as I know your kind of signals I will give a signal when I wish to locate you."

They were so sorry to part even for a moment with their brave companion but as it was extremely necessary, they could not object to offer no objection to the plan, so the boy bade them good bye for a while, and then going off in another direction, started over the country northward, and was soon lost to view in the far distance. The three boys, which had become companions of the little girls now begged permission to be able to take the land until he returned, saying they were anxious to show their own ability. So the girls and thanked them gratefully for their proposed assistance, and soon the boys had resumed the land. Now left alone and to themselves in this apparently strange land, the six comrades selected a pretty pathway and began walking along it. They began to believe this little pathway would possibly lead them to a pleasant camp or town or some other refuge or shelter. As they thought sure they could in the far distance a far off over the tops of trees. It did not seem as far as anyone it was, a tiny spot scattered on slowly, reaching all the beautiful scenery, the flowers, the ferns, and everything that lined the pathway, and instantly to the singing of the birds, and the soft chirping of the grasshoppers. Presently the path wound until it began to run alongside a beautiful little stream. A little beyond was a tiny camp surrounded by a field of wild flowers and fruit trees. Outside of the nearest bank of a white color, as they approached they observed a pleasant faced man sitting in the midst of a group of children to whom he seemed to be telling stories or talking to them. The children quickly discovered the strangers, and ran quickly toward them with exclamations of astonishment and delight, so that Gertrude Angeline and her girl and boy friends became the center of a curious group, all chattering excitedly. Their strange appearance seemed to arouse the wonder of the children themselves, all who were girls too, as they could not understand by three Glendalban boys should be seen with four pretty girls. This attraction seemed to please Gertrude Angeline particularly who patted the heads of the children kindly, and then looking with smiling eyes at the man inquired:

"Can you tell us sir, just what country or state this is?"

He stared a hard at the six strangers as he replied briefly:

"The state of Ozma Angeline."

"Oh Angeline, and the state of Ozma?" Exclaimed Gertrude Angeline, with a puzzled expression. "And where is the state of Ozma please?"

"In the quivering section of Angeline." Said he.

"What?" Exclaimed Angeline, in sudden excitement. "Do you mean to say we are in Angeline itself, far from Galvordia?"

"No he says I do," replied the man. "And you are only ten miles south of the city of Porphyria Gale that is surrounded by the highest fortresses in the world next to those of Irian. We say as you might to know as well as I do, but I'm sorry to say that Angeline is separated from the rest of the world by the row we are having with the Glendalban states. So having never seen one of those dreaded Glendalban armies we hear about we have been living here all by ourselves, for fear we may see them yet."

"I've been at Porphyria Gale, and even Angeline Agatha in before," said Angeline Jennings. "But I have never been at this part of the state."

"Did you ever hear of the small enemy many attempts to capture Angeline Agatha, and how they failed?" Asked Gertrude Angeline.

"Yes," said Angeline Jennings.

"We have a map somewhere in our possession showing the many sides of Angeline Agatha and Porphyria Gale though," asserted the man. "And it's a fine city to, I assure you. If only I could." He added, and then paused to look around he had carefully with a half-frightened expression. "If only--" here he stopped again, and if as if holding back to go on with his speech.

"If only what sir?" Asked Gertrude Angeline.

The man sent the children into the house. When he came closer to the strangers and whispered. "If only there were not so many Glendalban spies around here in this country, we would be happy and contented."

"What's the matter with spies it don't look as if spies could be here!" Asked Angeline Nichols curiously. But the man seemed frightened to even have dared to say so much. He retreated toward him to sit looking around him cautiously more by saying:

"A spy may be looking at us now and we would not know it. If we say anything wrong about the Glendalban the spy would assassinate you."

"What do you call them spies?" Asked Angeline Jennings.

"In this case," replied the man, "these kind of spies are out looking for some important Angeline personage to assassinate, but I guess we know the disposition of such spies as well as the man had said more."

"I wonder," said Angeline Nichols, going up to the kindly man. "If you could spare me and my friends something to eat. We have not had anything but berries, and the like we picked up in our travels in the woods for a long time."

"Please your dear girls. Of a course, I can spare you anything you would like." The man answered and entered Angeline's tent, he soon returned with a large tray loaded with sandwiches, cakes, cheese, and other food. One of the children got some water from the well near the tent and the six wanderers ate heartily and enjoyed the good things immensely.

When Aunt Abbie Jemison could not get any more she filled her pockets with what was left, and not even the boys or the other two girls objected to this. Indeed the little children belonging to the man did not object and seemed pleased to see the strangers out, so Gertrude Angelina finally decided that no matter how many spies were around they would watch them nevertheless and not take any chances with them.

"Whose large encampment is that so far away sir?" Gertrude asked, waving her hand toward a encampment that seemed to be on a high range of hills many miles away. "It belongs to some army whose I don't know but it is said it is under general gravel Johnston," he said.

"Oh indeed. And is it a glandolinian army?"

"That I cannot tell."

"Is it really as far as it looks?" Angelina asked inquired.

"I do not know my dear." And the less we know about the glandolinians and their way the safer from the spies we are."

It was evident the man did not like to talk about the glandolinians and so, having finished their meal, they said good bye to him and the children and continued on their way but directed their steps toward the encampment.

"Don't you think we had better not go near those camps, and keep away from any camps we see unless they fly the Angolinian flag, Gertrude?" Asked Angelina.

"Well," said she, "the glandolinians would find out sooner or later that we are in this state, so we may as well face the music now. From the fact that spies are also here is a sign we are still trailed by the glandolinians. Perhaps the situation is not quite so bad as the man you think it is. The glandolinians are not so shrewd as it is believed to be, you know, even if they do the best they know how to trail things."

"General Mandays glandolinians could trail a butterfly without guess," said Jennie Turner.

"General Mandays glandolinians, or those under his assistance are different from any other kind of glandolinians, from all I have heard," remarked Angelina. "The Riches maning as she walked beside Gertrude." And after all we are really in the Angolinian territory near Dorothy Gale and Angelina Agatha and for all we know that may be one of the Christian armies over yonder. I never heard of a glandolinian army being able to stay in the state of Ozmania, did you Jennie?"

"Not when any Angolinian army knows about it," she replied. "But it seems we landed in the wrong part of the state. We might have gone further on in the north."

"True enough," said Gertrude Angelina. "But we didn't, and so we must make the best of the country. Let's try not to be afraid."

"Oh I'm not at all scared just curious," said Jennie Turner truthfully, pausing to look at a small white rabbit that popped its head out of a hole in the field at the edge of the pathway.

"Nor am I," added Angelina. "Really Gertrude, I'm so glad to be in Angolinia again, that I think I am the luckiest little girl in all the world just now. Violet and her sisters live in Angolinia Agatha you know, and so does their parents, and Uncle, and all the rest of us, that we have not and had adventures with -- not to mention Evangelina St. Clare, and Mildred Maxwell, and the Vivian girls who are our sweetest friends in the world have had the best and most of adventures."

"Take your time Angelina," advised one of the boys. "I'm sure you can't say it all in one long breath. And you have not mentioned half of the fortifications of the cities of Dorothy Gale and Ozma."

"That there Dorothy Gale," said Gertrude Angelina impressively. "Happens to be on the other side of the hills, that we see the big army camps on. I don't want to discourage you Angelina, but we are most separated from Violet and her sisters as we were when we left the lines. They are far away from us by this time."

There was so much truth in this statement, that they all walked on in silence for some time. Finally they reached a grove of trees. They had gone half way through it when the sound of some one sobbing or in bitter distress, reached their ears, and caused them to make an abrupt halt.

It was Jennie Turner who was the first of them to discover, lying down on her face, beneath a spreading spreading oak tree near the pathway, a young girl whose body shook with the force of her sobs. She was dressed also as a boy scout. Her head however was washed and showed a mass of curly brown hair. Jennie Turner looked down on the young girl and said:

"Why are you crying for friend?"

"For a good reason," cried the young girl, interrupting her sobs, to suddenly roll over, face upward, that she might be able to see who had spoken. "I am now for I'm wounded."

"Couldn't you find a way to some place to get help?" asked one of the little girls.

"I'm not hardly able to walk," wailed the young girl.

By this time Gertrude Angelina and her other friends had arrived at the spot, and Gertrude looked over and said in a very sympathetic voice:

"Tell us your troubles friend, and perhaps we may be able to help you."

The young girl then sat up but with difficulty, and bowed politely. Afterwards she managed to get upon her feet with their help, but still kept wringing her hands as she tried to check down her sobbing sobs. Gertrude and the others through thought she was very brave to control such awful misery so well.

"My name is Angus Trot," he began. "I'm one of the Vivian girls girl scouts."

"Then you belong to the old regiments of girl scouts, I suppose," said Angelina.

"Yes indeed," was the reply. "I do all the heavy spy work. And it was not my fault that I was a fugitive for a hundred miles."

"Was you really?" asked Gertrude.

"I don't see why," remarked Jennie Turner, staring at the wounded girl.

"And from whose glandolinians did you escape?" inquired Gertrude Angelina.

"From general Federals, whose army is far away. The Vivian girls who are the sweetest creatures on earth who is fond of flowers of all kinds sent me out into a small field not far from the Christian lines to pick some daisies that they saw growing there. I secured the flowers but was pursued by rebels hiding in ambush. For my work I was rewarded. I used to be so bashful that I used to cast down my eyes as the Vivian girls passed me, but the day I brought them the flowers and gave them rough all the trouble for them, I glanced up and found them gazing at me with a very tender look in their eyes. After I got the flowers one of them dismissed the attendants and on coming to my side, began to talk long with me. She said that I had touched their hearts as no other girl had ever done. I kissed Violet's hand. The day after I was sent out by general Vivian himself with some boys on a scouting tour. I had no longer been out for a few minutes when a bunch of wicked looking soldiers came upon me. The boys were shot down before they could get away, and the rebel who failed to catch me kicked the dead boys with his foot. When I had to make a run for it or be killed too."

"You wasn't they awful indeed," said Angelina Riches indignantly.

"The glandolinians are very abrupt," said the girl. "Go it was the last I could expect. Up to that time I had no thought of encountering the glandolinians. I was a fugitive ever since then having lost my way. I was pursued thirty times, and fired at also, and the glandolinians had persisted so that finally they wounded me though I succeeded in escaping to here."

This morning I happened to meet a number of Christian soldiers who also no mistook me for a spy and they shot and wounded me and then being attacked by glandolinians we were forced to leave me go."

"Why those glandolinians must be monsters," cried Angelina Riches.

"In character they are far worse than that," said Gertrude mournfully.

"But see here," interrupted Jennie Turner who had listened carefully to Angus.

"The Angolinians who may have made the mistake of pursuing you for a rebel boy scout may not be so much to blame for your uniform deceived them. The Angolinians are mighty cautious, and it is not reasonable for them to allow any glandolinian to escape from them."

"It is not right either." Said one of the boys. "You should have disarmed your uniform before the Angolians observed you."
"I'm not able to do that as I would have to go around half naked the next time I tested Angos." "If I had my rights I would get revenge on the Glandolinians for that. As it is, I'm one of the captives of the Glandolinians, and as good a leader as any one else."
"How does that come to be so?" Asked Gertrude Angeline.

"I got the commission from rescuing one of the Glandolinian girls. One day while out cutting with them, we had a meeting with a horde of Glandolinian soldiers on horseback. In our desperate attempt to escape the one of the horses ridden by Violet, a Glandolinian was shot down by the Glandolinians who fired a volley and as the horse fell she was thrown into a deep creek alongside the road. At once the Glandolinians threw in some stones to weigh her down so that her body could not rise again. It was impossible to kill her however for we managed to get her out by shooting the Glandolinians down, but as soon as we had rescued her we had to make our get away and in good time too for they gave us a volley. The Glandolinians then pursued us like mad but I and my companions helped Violet to get away and we encountered a column of Christian troops who drove the pursuing Glandolinians away. I was only a common girl scout then, but for that deed I received a commission as captain. I had served with the Glandolinian girls for seven months."

"My, that is a terribly exciting story." Said Angeline Nichee drawing a long breath. "But tell us Angos whose Glandolinians were they that caused you so much excitement?"

"Oh, they were the Glandolinians under general Federal. It is said his Glandolinians are the worse, but however that may be, I have never seen a Federal man again so far."

"Seems to me," Said Angeline Nichee "if general Hanson Vivian could only get at Federal properly he could capture him and his whole army."

"Well general Federal is the ablest Glandolinian general known." Admitted Angos, "and so are the Manlayes, so they are of equal rank, although they are of different commissions. I can't see why the Manlayes have not even won this war they are so far fiercer."

"It's a sort of mixup mess taken altogether." Remarked Gertrude Angeline. "But we are now on our way to visit Angolinia Agathia or Dorothy Gale, and if we get a chance my girl friend we will put in a good word for you. You must come along with us and we'll do what we can for you."

"Is your wound very bad?" Inquired Jennie Turner.

"Not so bad as to make me helpless of course." Said Angos.

"Well we can fix them up for you." Said Gertrude. "And when you have a chance you ought to give the Glandolinians just as good a treatment as they gave you."

"That's common sense." Agreed Angeline Nichee.

So they tended to the girls' wounds and then resumed their journey toward the direction of the mountains.

When after four days traveling, without shelter at that time, our three or four girl friends and three boys approached the outskirts of the encampments after scaling the hills for a whole day before reaching the top they found the outskirts of it guarded by a line of soldiers dressed in splendid light blue uniforms. They were armed with guns and bayonets. Gertrude Angeline walked straight up to one of them and having her disguise would save her and her friends asked:

"Does general Raymond Richardson Federal happen to be here, and is this his precious army?"

"He is magnificent and glorious Excellency, general Raymond Richardson Federal, and his glorious army happens not to be here." Was the stiff reply. "If you are looking for him, go elsewhere."

"Nevertheless we will go through this line of camps and say how-de-do." Continued Gertrude Angeline as bravely as possible, attempting to pass the sentry.

But the soldier barred her way with his gun crossed.

"Who are you four gray clothed girls, and what's your name and who are those three boys with you, and where did you all come from?" Demanded the sentry.

7-573

"You soldiers would not have sense enough to know if we happened to tell you." returned Gertrude equally defiant, "seeing as we are strangers in a strange camp. We are under no ones orders, whether Glandolinian, or National and so put that in your pipe and smoke it. Top aside please." And she drew her gun on him, while the other girls and the three boys did the same. The soldier was suddenly taken unawares and seeing the determined looks of the girls and the boy had to let them pass, saying:

"Oh if you are strangers, you will be permitted to enter, since they have no at a disadvantage. Our general will be fond of strangers, especially girls." And he shouldered his musket.

"So many strangers come here sir?" Demanded Angeline Nichee eyeing him suspiciously.

"You are the first girls and boys that have ever come into our lines as strangers and succeeded." Said the man. "But our general has often said that if strangers ever entered his lines no matter who they were or what side they belonged, he would see to it they had very exciting times indeed."

Gertrude Angeline looked at her friends thoughtfully. "He was not very favorably impressed by this last remark. But as she and they decided that as now there was no escape from the camp, and that to back out now would be their undoing it would be more wise, to take the chances to confront the Glandolinian general, or whoever he was boldly, and try and win his favor long enough to get out again."

So they entered the encampments being suddenly escorted by one of the soldiers. The general's tent certainly was a very beautiful one. The passage of the company streets were winding, and above handsomely decorated with many colored flags, and after following several of these the one soldier led them into an open court way that occupied the very center of the encampment. It was surrounded on every side by high tents, and contained many things of military use. Out in the open camp a company street in an open space near the biggest tent of the camp they saw a group of officers standing in conversation by a tall tree, who surrounded a tall lean general who wore upon his head a large rounded sailor hat with red and yellow plumes on top. Indeed they observed that his face was hard and sullen, and through the slits of his half closed eyes for he had just awakened from a nap, the eyes glowed like coals of fire. He was dressed in a brilliant satin and velvet gray uniform and was standing with his back against a tree, starting to light a cigar. This personage was general Ignatz Hylate and as soon as Gertrude Angeline saw this handsome but hard faced man, Gertrude Angeline and her followers knew at once that she was not going to like this Glandolinian general.

"Hello, who are these four girls and three boys coming over here?" Said the general, with a deep scowl.

"Strangers your Excellency." Answered the soldier who had escorted them and bowing so low that his head almost touched the ground, and Gertrude felt like giving him a kick.

"Strangers oh? Well, well what an unexpected visit indeed. I hope they are not Angolinian spies. Advance strangers, and you girls first give an account of yourselves."

The general's voice was more harsh than his features. Angeline Nichee and the others shuddered a little, but Gertrude Angeline calmly replied:

"There isn't much for us girls to say except, that we have arrived, to look over the country around Dorothy Gale and Angolinia Agathia, and see how we like it. We saw your camp here and thought it was general Federal's army but we're mistaken. Judging from the way you speak, you don't know what important personages we are, or who we are, and what we are like, or you would have jumped up to shake hands with us, and offer us a seat somewhere whether we are for your side or not. All generals, whether they are Insurgents or Federal, always treat us pretty well whether they liked to do so or not, but we see that in this encampment—which doesn't amount to a pin head any how—you people don't even respect a girl."

The Glandolinian general listened with amazement to this bold saucy speech, first with a frown, and then gazing at the four girls, and the three boys with evident curiosity, fear, and suspicion. The other officers though brave Glandolinians were almost dumb with fear, for no one had ever dared to ever speak in such a manner to their so-called Glandolinian general before.

"I cannot believe our combined forces are powerful enough to capture Angelina Agatha, and we must watch out, for we know nothing about these three strange girls and boys, and if they are Federal spies they may do something, and cause our plans to be interfered with. I suspect that these four girls, are the ones known as the Darling Angelina Amazons, known as Angelina Aronburg, Angelina de la, Jennie Francis, and Angelina Jennings or they would not be able to carry on airs as they do and get through our lines despite the entires. Those three boys I do not know however."

"I don't like those three girls you mentioned outside of Jennings, they look dangerous." Answered general Turner. "But perhaps you may be mistaken about their being the ones you mentioned. Why don't you test them, or placed them under a cross examination, or grill them?"

"How?" Asked general Mylletze.

"Send for Colonel Go, Colonel Wiche. He is a disguise reader, and having known those girls and also the Vivian girls he will tell you in a moment whether those three prettiest girls are the ones you suspect or not."

"Is that a good idea?" cried the general. "Why did I not think of the colonel before? But that colonel demands rich rewards for identifying any persons I suspect as spies and enemies."

"Never mind your Excellency I will pay him." Promised general Turner. So an orderly was dispatched to summon the colonel, whose tent was but a few leagues from general Turner Mylletze's headquarters, while they awaited his arrival the old general proposed that they pay a visit to general Clondy's and see if he had proposed to do anything concerning further retreat northward, so the two started away together. And what was their anger when they turned a corner of a pathway to find in a quiet nook of the camp a spy soldier and two other men searching the pockets of a soldier they had overcome. With a roar of rage the general dashed forward, but the spy and his companions had scaled the wall near the camp by means of jumping like monkeys and when he saw the general and a crowd of soldiers coming they scaled the wall, and after firing some shots with out effect made good their escape. One spy who was a young drummer boy however did not succeed in getting away and was confronted by the angry general and soldiers who were trembling with a fur, and fear that they could not express in words. Seizing the drummer boy by his arm the soldier two of them dragged him into the camp and toward a tent. When pushing him roughly inside they left while two guards were placed over the tent. Then later just as the arrival of the colonel was announced the boy was taken into the general's headquarters and then transferred as a prisoner to the barracks where Gertrude and her friends were.

Hearing of the arrival of the colonel the general breathed easier. He was accompanied by another man who smiled like a tiger smiling showing all his hideous teeth. And the colonel smiled more hideously but like a snake smiling, for he had no teeth whatever. The two men then went before the general.

Now then so happened that Angelina Riches from the window of her own room, had witnessed the escape of the soldier spies in the outskirts of the company streets, and had seen the general and soldiers capture the poor drummer boy, and drag him away. The little girl's heart went in the greatest sympathy for the poor little drummer boy, who seemed to her to be one of the sweetest and loveliest young lads she had ever seen, so she crept along the passages of the building and for a moment hid in a hidden niche saw the poor boy looked in a small room. Fortunately the key happened to be still in the lock, so when the two soldiers had gone away, fortunately forgetting to leave a guard, Angelina stole up to the iron grated door, turned the key, took it out of the keyhole, and putting it in her pocket entered the room. The little boy lay on the floor upon a stone bench, sobbing bitterly. Angelina Riches went up to him and tried to comfort him.

"Don't cry now," she said. "I've unlocked the door for you and you may go away any time you want to and escape the Landolinians."

"It doesn't matter," sobbed the little boy. "I am unhappy because I am left far behind my friends the Angelina children."

"Well never mind, those escaped spies are not any great shakes anyhow to deserve desertion like they did, seems to me." Said Angelina Riches softly.

The boy rolled over on the stone bench and looked at the little girl reproachfully. "For their kind ways the Vivian girls have won my heart, and I can't help loving to do services for them." He exclaimed. "I went out to help them men upon the rebels for the sake." Then with sudden indignation he added: "But I'll never allow the Landolinians to shoot me as a spy, never--as long as I live."

"I should say not," replied Angelina Riches. "But these spies or soldiers who had been with you, and deserted you may not be much good, but the Landolinians here are very, very bad, and fortunately do not know me yet. Just around, and I'm sure you will find some one worth your time of escape. You are a very pretty boy you know, and almost any one of the Vivian girls ought to love you. You were good to do what you can to please them."

"You don't understand, my dear girl friend." Said the drummer boy as he wiped the tears from his eyes with a faintly lace handkerchief. "When you are a fugitive or a prisoner you will realize that a young spy cannot decide how he can escape the enemy when once he is their prisoner." "By own heart alone decides for me what is my greater danger and which is not, whether my peril amounts to much or not."

Angelina Riches was a little puzzled by the speech, which seemed to her to be unreasonable, but she made no reply and presently the drummer boy's grief softened or subsided, and he began to question the little girl about herself and her adventures. Angelina Riches told him how he also had come to be in general Turner Mylletze's camp, and all about Gertrude Angelina and her other boy and girl friends, while the boy and girl were thus conversing together getting more and more friendly as the two became better and better acquainted, in the council chamber the two generals and the colonel were talking together. The old colonel was hugely and had a wicked race. He had no doubt during a battle which he fought in lost one eye and wore a black patch over it, so the Landolinian soldiers named him "Pirate eye." Of course this Landolinian general or colonel I mean was the terror of all the Christian spies and therefore was feared and hated. The old general used this colonel's powers and knowledge at many times to assist him to carry out his powers to do test spies or for some acts of revenge, but he was always obliged to pay the colonel large sums of money before he would undertake to do anything the general wished. This made the general hate the old colonel almost as much as the Christian spies or fugitives did, but to day general Turner had agreed to pay the colonel's price, so the Landolinian general greeted the old man with gracious favor.

"Can you discover the disguise of any spy within my lines who happen to be the Vivian girls or their friends?" Inquired the general Mylletze.

The colonel winked as a demon himself, thought about it before he replied.

"That is certainly a hard question to answer. I can do lots of things to detect the disguises of spies and who they really are, but the disguises of the Vivian girls are cleverly arranged and therefore a stubborn thing to conquer. When you think you have detected one of them as the Vivian girls it's liable to bob up that it is not them after all. I believe the Vivian girls and their friends are too clever to even allow themselves to be detected. In other words, detecting their disguises is a hard job, even for a skillful detector as I'm but I believe I can do something that will answer your purpose just as well."

"What is that sir?" Asked the general.

"I can spy upon them myself. I've got a special way of discovering their ways by that means, and when I have detected them through their ways I can have them grilled and find them out."

"Just the thing." Exclaimed general Turner Mylletze. And general Turner was likewise much pleased. They bargained a very long time as to the price, but finally general Turner agreed to pay the old colonel's demands. It was arranged that they should take the captured boy-drummer to the colonel's house the next day, to have him grilled first of all things. Then general Turner Mylletze mentioned to the old colonel the kind of a girl the oldest of them seemed to be, and said to him:

"I think the three boys, and one girl with them--are unable to harm me by any amount of spying, but I have a suspicion that the oldest girl, and two of her companions are powerful spies, and good crackshots at the pistol too."

The old colonel's face wore a trouble look when he heard this.

"If you are right about that!" He said to one girl in my apartment, "I will be best for me to meet the oldest of the three strange girls at once, and watch my shadow against her, to decide which is the quickest."

"All right!" said general Turner. "Come with me and I will lead you to the girls' room."

General Turner Myltsze did not accompany them as he was obliged to go out to give orders for his army to start on its move northward for a Christian army was advancing up the hills on big force, so the other two rebels climbed several flights of stone stairs and then went through many of the passages until they came to the room occupied by Gertrude Angeline, and her two friends Jennie Turner and Angeline. Gertrude Angeline finding her bed soft and inviting, and being tired with the adventures she had experienced with her friends, had decided to take a nap, believing all being well. When the wicked old colonel and the general whose name was Kravol Turner opened the door and entered Gertrude Angeline and Jennie Turner was seemingly sound asleep and did not seem to hear them at all.

"Ah!" said the old colonel in a soft whisper. "I believe you are right general Turner. That eldest girl looks to me as if she might be Angeline Aronburg, and the other one Jennie Turner. By good luck I have caught them both asleep, so I shall smother them before they wake up, giving them suffocation in such a form, that they will be unable to live five minutes."

"Careful though!" cautioned the general, also speaking in a low voice. "If they discover what you are doing they may shoot you and me too."

But the wicked old colonel realized as well as he did that he must be careful. He drew several packets from his pocket. Three of these he carefully selected, replacing some others back in his pocket. Two of the strange packets he mixed together and then he cautiously opened the third. He then placed all on a table, and taking a basin mixed the powders into it.

"Better stand back to leave the room as soon as I signal to you," he advised-- "for when this powder starts to smoke after I light it it will send a gas through the room that will kill us."

The general hastily retreated to the door way while the colonel with a handkerchief over his mouth and nose lighted the powder with a match and then backed away toward the door way as quickly as possible. It was apparently that Gertrude Angeline and Jennie Turner was slumbering peacefully apparently unconscious of what was going on. Puff! A great cloud of blue smoke rolled toward the bed and over it, and so plotely hid the girls from view. Then for a moment the smoke rolled away, both the old colonel and the general saw the two girls standing in the middle of the room with drawn pistols putting out the smoking powder's just in time. And as she did so Gertrude cried out in a loud voice:

"Here you rascally people, what do you mean by treating us girls so. Trying to assassinate us. I'll shoot you down like a dog."

The general turned pale as a ghost as she pointed her revolver at him, but the old colonel laughed in derision. When he quickly drew his sabre, and aimed a vicious blow at Gertrude, but before the sharp blade struck her, Gertrude had jumped aside and fired, seriously wounding him. And then she and her friend friend leaped up to the window as still and jumped out through open window, and ran across a small meadow where they disappeared from view.

"Good night!" shouted the general. "Nevertheless we are well rid of these two dangerous girls." And then they both laughed heartily at the success of their routing out the two girls, and went away to complete their horrid plans of having the two fugitives run down by means of blood hounds. After Angeline Riches had visited a time with the boy friend, the little girl having shown him how to get out of the building without being seen, and a way out of the rebel lines, went to the room where the three boys had been but did not find them there. When she went up to Gertrude Angeline's room, but neither she or Jennie Turner was there because the two Landolinian officers had been there before her. So she made her way down downstairs, and questioned some of the soldiers she met. They said they had seen the three little boys go out into the company street some time ago, but Gertrude Angeline or her companions they had not seen at all.

Therefore Angeline Riches, not knowing what else to do, crept through the company street, seeking for the boys and her three girl friends and not finding either of them, but receiving sudden suspicious looks from every Landolinian soldier she met or questioned, and some Landolinians whispered something about her she did not hear. This part of the company street, which lay before the general's own headquarters, was not walled in by tents, but extended to a large roadway leading out of the camp and down the hill, and paths also were open to the hill top forest, so after three hours of vain search for her friends, the little girl made her way toward the general's headquarters.

But at the entrance way three stern soldiers stopped her.

"I live here or come here for the night," said Angeline Riches. "It is all right for you to let me in. The general has given me and my friend some room."

"Well if he has it was his gracious excellency to take it back for himself again," was the reply from one of the surly soldiers. "It is his excellency's orders to see that you girls are turned away if you attempt to enter. I am also ordered to for bid the three boys, your companions to again enter the building. You are all under suspicion."

"How about Gertrude Angeline and her friends?" she inquired.

"Oh! It seems they have disappeared in a mysterious manner," replied the soldier, shaking his head ominously. "Where they have probably made their way to, I cannot make out, but I can assure you they are no longer in the general's headquarters. I'm sorry little girl, to disappoint you. Don't blame me, I must obey my general's orders."

Now all her life Angeline Riches had been accustomed to depend on Gertrude Angeline, so when it seemed that she and her good friends were suddenly taken away from her without warning too, she had a suspicion that something happened, and so she felt very miserable and forlorn indeed. She indeed was brave enough not to cry before any of the soldiers she met, or let them see her grief or anxiety, but after she was turned away from the general's headquarters, she sought a quiet place some where on the outskirts of the camp where no one seemed to be around and for a time sobbed as if her heart would break. It was the three boys who found her, at last, just as the sun began to set, and the shades of evening were beginning to fall. They had also been turned away from the general's headquarters, when they had tried to enter it, and, in the outskirts of the Landolinian encampment they came across Angeline Riches.

"Never mind!" said one of the boys soothingly. "We can find a place to sleep somewhere."

"I want my friend Gertrude Angeline," wailed the girl.

"Well so do I Angeline," was the reply. "But we have not got her or her girl friends, where do you suppose they are Riches Dear?"

"I don't know at all and don't suppose anything," they are gone, and that is all I know about it."

The boys sat on the bench beside her and one of them thrust his hands in his pocket of his trousers. When they all reflected somewhat gravely for the time.

"Gertrude Angeline or the other girls are not around here," he said, letting his eyes wander over the dim encampment. "So we must go somewhere out of the camp if we cannot find them. Besides it's fast getting dark, the Landolinians are getting suspicious of us, and if we want a place to sleep where it is safe we must get away, while we can see our way to go."

He rose from the bench as he said this, and Angeline Riches also jumped up, drying her eyes on her handkerchief. The other boys got up too and looked around. When she walked in front of them starting out of the encampment. They did not go by the main path as the rebel guards were there, but passed cautiously through an opening in a long hedge and found themselves in a small but well-worn roadway. Following this for some distance through gathering darkness, along a long winding way, they soon began a descent of the hill and after an hour's descent reached the foot. But came upon no house or building or any encampment, that could afford them refuge for the night, and to make matters worse a severe thunder storm was approaching. And with the crash of thunder and the flash of lightning it was beginning to rain. It became so dark on account of the heavy clouds that they could scarcely see their way, and finally Angeline Riches stopped under a thick leafy tree and suggested they they sleep under some ledge of rocks.

"All right said the oldest of the three boys. "I've often found that a good ledge of rock"

"It certainly is. George, let's go over and see if it is a house or a sheltering tent. The whoever lives there or may live there may not treat us any worse than the Glandelinians did."

"General Tamar Mylotzo suspected four girls were spies and plotted to cause your detection." Said he, "for to day when I was a prisoner he saw the for the old colonel who they call 'Pirate oye' and with my own eyes I saw him one from his own headquarters, and go to the generals house. I know he had been with general Mylotzo and murder and I was afraid they were going to make some some to cause your detection and the detection of your girl friends, but perhaps Gertrude and I had been discovered but just have fled, after not being able to

"I don't know, but they have disappeared, so I'm pretty certain Gertrude you mention and her girl friends have discovered the plot and fled via while the going was good before the glandelinians could do anything dreadful to them. But don't worry. If it had happened you would be worse off, and it would not be able to be helped, and if they have fled from the rebel encampments we may be able to discover your friends in the morning."

ed the fierce wrinkled Abyssinians, the grinning Abissinians, the Gikilins, and quellings and so on as well as all other big armies, and it was so considered a great favor to be allowed to serve this general who was famous and would not admit it. Among the many wonderful things general Hanson could do and on was general jack gnomes, Henry Joseph Parlier and their great spies and Cominians secret sorcive men. They were as good to Hanson as Glinda's Red and book was her. Those spies working everywhere like war stricken countries could detect everything that took place in all parts of California, just the instant it happened or was going to happen, so that by referring and trusting to the work of those spies general Hanson knew what was taking place, or what was going to take place, what the enemy intended to do and everything else so that Hanson never was surprised. In this way he learned when and where he could help a Christian army in distress or danger, and how to frustrate enemies, and so on, and although his duties are positively confined to assisting the use of other armies who fight elsewhere throughout war torn California, he is always interested in what takes place in the unprotected portions of California.

"What is news about General Manley and his army in the way of news?" He asked. General Hanson Bryan had been looking in d every direction with his glasses, and when he greeted his brother he said

"Here is a note sent to me by some unknown friend which seems quite interesting and curious." He announced an aspect of surprise in his voice. "... Four girls and four boys have arrived as spies in Tovar Myetzo (Madolinin) area."

"What is now about General Hanley and his army in the way of news?" He asked. General Hanlon had been looking in every direction with his glasses, and when he greeted his brother he said

"Here is a note sent to me by some unknown friend which was quite interesting and curious." He announced an ascent of surprise in his voice. "... Four girls and four boys have arrived as spies in Inner Myetso (Ladakh) area."

".....There is general Izner Mylet's army," declared general Robert Vivian.
 "Very near here, a little west of us," he said. "In fact general Izner Mylet's army is sixty three miles northwest of porothy Gale or Angolinia Agathia, and separated from us by a range of high mountains of which he had and his army had been occupying, at the foot of which lies a deep desert, that is supposed to be impassable."
 "How some one will have to drive him away or he will go to Mouleys aid," said Robert Vivian.

"Yes," returned general Hanson, "Vivian but none of our other general know nothing of his presence, except we ourselves."

"What did the message say about him and his army?" asked the Emperor.
 "His army is conducted by a wicked daring handsome looking general called Izner Myletze, although from the uniform he wears he does not seem to be having the rank of a general. Most of his glandolinians are gaurians, but they all are very fierce and all people in his path live in constant fear of his approach. There are also many generals in his army, and his advance since it started northward, since his repulse on Angolinia Agathia, keeps the inhabitants of gaurania state in a state of terror."

"Do the generals of Izner Myletze's army have any knowledge of our own presence?" inquired Robert Vivian.

"Yes and they understand their own ways too for one of them had just caused the girls and boys who entered the lines to flee for their very lives. This same general or officer of why I what ever rank he has is also planning to have the fugitives trailed by the most vicious bloodhounds and the fugitives are headed our way."

"Why that's a dreadful thing to do," exclaimed general Vivian. "And I'll stop it if I have to destroy Mylet's army to do so."
 Hanson's face was very grave. He read in his mind how Gertrude Angeline and her girl and boy friends were forced to leave the rebel encampment, and how they found refuge with a boy drummer in a little tent, out in driving roaring thunderstorm highraged even where the armies of Hanson and Vivian are now encamped also.

"I'm afraid these helpless Angolinian fugitive girls and boys who over they are will endure much suffering before they get here, even if the wicked general and the glandolinians do not decide to pursue them," said general Hanson thoughtfully. "I wish I might help them but do not know which way they are."

"Can I do anything?" asked Penrod the boy spy of Hanson's staff. "If so tell me sir what to do, and I'll do it."
 For a few minutes general Hanson Vivian did not reply, but sat musing over the new message. Then he said:

"I'm going to send you to general Izner Mylet's army, or atleast in its direction, with a big force of boy scouts to protect Gertrude Angeline and her unknown friends."
 "All right answered the brave boy scout, already in a cheerful voice. "I know Gertrude Angeline already for she had been in adventures with me before. You remember she went away from our own lines to scout on the enemy and with some friends who were with her because lost."

"Yes," said general Hanson Vivian. "I remember that." Then he carefully instructed Penrod what to do and gave him permission to carry small grenades with him for the use of his friends and himself.

"As you have no need to fear the enemy in this case," said Robert Vivian shaking hands with the boy. "You may as well start at once with your company." My daughters will favor you greatly for this."

"Night and day is the same to me," the boy replied. "Except that I cannot see my way a wall in the dark. But then neither can the enemy."

"I will also furnish you one of the Vivian girls to guide you," promised general Robert Vivian.
 But the brave boy, declared that he wished to go alone and so he bade good bye to every one he knew, and having gathered all the boys he wished to have accompany him at once started on his journey. By morning he had reached a small range of hills, with his company and as they continued onward they were forced to stop in surprise for not far from Penrod was a rope unrolling itself for hundreds of feet, until it caught upon a peak of rock below and some one was tightening it there. Then some one was seen starting to climb down the rope. While he was descending the rope, a group of the boys by Penrod's orders moved forward, and soon the boy who ever he was found himself surrounded by a group of gray coated boys on horseback.

"Why's it Gertrude Angeline, our little Dare Devil," gasped Penrod in amazement. The girl who really she was stood up and examined the boys carefully and a moment she discovered Penrod despite his disguise. So she ran toward him and so united to gether she told her story how she and her friends in their flight had been separated sadly. While she spoke the boys continued on their way there being over two hundred of them. Presently they were out of the range of hilly ground and far away they could see the city of camps that they believed must be Izner Mylet's army. and toward this the whole party began to ride.

In the tent used by the drummer boy, one of the young boyscouts happened to be the first one to awaken in the morning. Leaving his companions still asleep, he went out into the fresh morning air with the purpose to see how far he was from the enemy's camp and was surprised by a party of glandolinians who happened to be the dreaded Gargoylans on horseback. He fortunately observed these terrible glandolinians just in the nick of time and going behind some tall briar bushes he watched the approaching Ka klaz Klaws. More glandolinians were then seen approaching from another direction, and fearing he would be seen he tried to make his way to the hut, but a saw glandolinians approaching from that direction also. The boy knew that if he only was once seen he would be killed, so he kept himself in hiding as he wandered on, from bush to bush, with out allowing the glandolinians to see him or paying any heed to where he was wandering. He must have kept going for a long time and when finally he found he had outdistanced the glandolinians he paused to look around him and could see no signs of the tent, where Angeline and her and his two boy companions had been and he had not even the slightest idea in which direction it lay.

"Well, it's an account of those old glandolinians that I'm lost," he remarked to himself. "But never mind I have been lost many times just account of glandolinians and I had to do it to prevent being seen by them. Someone maybe sure to find me."

Angeline and her two friends were a little worried about the boy companion when they awoke and found him gone. Knowing how careless the lad may have been, she believed he strayed away and encountered the enemy, but felt that if nothing happened to him he would come back in time, or be rescued, because he was a clever lad and could find his way back if he tried. The drummer boy got the little girl and the two other boys some food for their breakfast, and then together they went out of the tent and stood in the sunshine to observe their own surroundings. The tent occupied by the drummer boy was some distance of the road, but they could see it from the distance they were now at, and both gave a start of surprise when they discovered a gang of soldiers riding along the highway, and followed by about thirty foot men, and escorting a boy between them. The poor boy had his hands bound together, to prevent him from struggling, and two of the soldiers ran roughly and rudely dragged him forward when his steps seemed to lag. Behind this big group came a haughty looking glandolinian officer, wearing a hat that seemed to the two boys and girl as if it had been made from a stove pipe pipe it was so high, and swinging in his hands a slender golden staff, with a ball of cluster red gems at one end.

"Where are they going to take the little boy?" asked Angeline in her.

"To some secret place of hiding, I fear," the drummer boy replied. "Gone laws follow them, for I am sure they intend to harm the poor boy and it is our duty to prevent them if possible."

"Won't they see us?" she asked.

"We won't let them if we can possibly help it. I know a short cut through the trees to their destination."

So they hurried away quickly through the trees, and reached the small hut to which they were sure the glandolinians were heading for, and just ahead of the glandolinians to. Hiding the twelve in thick shrubbery, they watched the slow approach of the poor boy and his wicked escort, all of whom passed so near to them that any of the three boys, and the girl could have put a hand and touched the boy prisoner, had they dared to do.

The hut was as small as a small horse barn, with a door and window on one side. It had a chimney but no smoke was coming from it, and as the Glandelinians brought the little boy to one of the doors it was opened by the wicked looking officer in person. He was soon at the boy's side with evil gleam, and rubbed his hands together to show the delight with which he was getting his boy victim, for the old rascal was indeed pleased to perform his wicked deed on so sweet a looking boy as he had now a prisoner and whom he claimed was a spy. The boys struggled to resist when they had been to enter the house was pretty desperate, so three soldiers (it took three soldiers to handle a small boy) forced him through the doorway, and even the old officer gave him a shove as he followed a lone behind. The driver, or boy indeed was so angry at the cruelty shown the boy prisoner that he forgot all his caution and rushed forward to force his way into the house also, but some of the soldiers prevented him, pushing him away with violence and standing the door in his face.

"Never mind," said Angeline, "he has worth in him, as the boy rose from where he had fallen. You alone could not do much to help the poor little boy if you were inside. How fortunate it is that we have not a band of soldiers with us."

"True," he answered sadly. "It is indeed our misfortune sure enough, but if we did have a band of soldiers with us, it may be of no use either, but nevertheless the unlucky circumstances are that we got to save him ourselves, but how?"

"I don't see how we can, duty or no duty," observed Angeline, "I see."

"No we see a powerlessness, for they are too many and are stronger than we are. But we might peek in through one of the windows, and see what they are doing. And if we see a way to save him we will take advantage of it."

Angeline, who was somewhat curious too, so the four crept up to one of the windows nearest them and looked in, and fortunately it happened that the one inside the house was so busy that they did not notice Angeline, and the three boys were watching the boy who had been tied to a stout post near the wall and one of the soldiers was giving the colonel a quantity of money, which some one had provided in payment no doubt for the capture of the boy. When this had been done the officer said to one of the soldiers:

"Are you perfectly sure you can grill this spy properly so that he will be forced to give the information I wish to know?"

"Sure as witchcraft itself, your Excellency," was the reply.

"Then get to work, and hurry at it," said the officer. "There may be some very unpleasant features about the ceremony you are going to perform, and which would annoy me, so I'll bid you good day, and leave you to carry on your contract. One word however; if you fail in this, I shall burn the boy in at the stake and you too." Then he had led the other soldiers to follow him, and throwing wide the big door of the hut walked out. This action was so sudden, that the general and his soldiers almost caught Angeline, who and the three boys caved dropping, but they managed to quickly run around the house before they saw them. Away he and his soldiers marched up the road followed by the ordering cavalier men, heartlessly leaving the poor little boy to the mercies of the wicked Glandelinian officer. When they again took the chance to a creep up to the window, Angeline, who had, and the three boys saw the rebel officer glancing over the boy. Although nearly fainting from fear and horror, the poor boy gazed with a haughty defiance into the face of the wicked creature; but he was bound so tightly to the pillar, that he could do no more to express his loathing.

Pretty soon the old rebel officer went to a small fire place where there was glowing coals, and placed in it the front parts of some tongs. Then the officer took out a searchlight and with it gave three flashes and at every flash the door opened on the interior of the place and a man another man entered. These rebels also were very ugly but when the leading rebel whispered his orders to them, they grinned with wicked joy. First one and then another cast something into the coal fire, when to the astonishment of the watchers at the window, three strange little maidens of exquisite beauty, suddenly appeared in the room dressed in the most dainty costumes imaginable.

Only the eyes of the little maidens could not be disguised, for a strange yet fierce glare shone in their depths. To have seen them no one could have helped to admire them, and Angeline, Riches and the three boys were certainly all admiring them, for they had never seen anything so dainty and bewitching, and their attention seemed to be drawn to the dread of the four Glandelinians. The Glandelinians who had placed the things into the fire, stopped and stared in amazement. One by one the beautiful creatures approached the coal fire and drew out the implements, and to utter some strange words. Their movements were graceful and odd and even rhythmic, and the old Glandelinian watched them with an evil grin on his wicked face.

Finally Angeline, who feared the three may be the civilian girls. The old rebel had lifted up the things and going toward the boy he was going to put it down on his arm when the girls help up back with revolvers drawn on him. The rebel slowly dropped the weapon while the boy seemed to have fainted. The girls then went toward the boy still keeping the rebels covered and bursting in to a chorus of wild laughter, the three beautiful girls fairly danced out of the place. Angeline, Riches, rubbed her eyes to prove that she was wide awake and seeing clearly, for her astonishment was great when the three lovely little maidens leaped upon the three black horses and jerking at the Glandelinians' reins away. And the Glandelinians seemed to know who they were for they hindered not and let them go. Angeline, Riches and the three boys had been so intent upon this scene that in their eagerness to follow the retreating figures the boy had accidentally pressed against the glass pane with his arm and the glass broke and its fragments fell with a crash into the room. The Glandelinians uttered a curse and then seeing that they had been observed, they rushed for the open window with pistols drawn. But the three boys came off like the wind and Angeline, Riches followed at their heels. Fear and desperation lent them strength to run, to leap across wide ditches, to speed up small hills and to vault high or low fences like a deer would. The band of three Glandelinians in the room had thrown open the door and started in pursuit on horseback and really gained on the fugitives, and thought they had them, when Angeline, Riches alone promptly shot them down one by one. The old colonel himself on a horse had followed after the fugitives but seeing his three comrades killed realized he alone would not only be unable to overtake the fugitives but got would be killed if he did. The old man however was so angry that Angeline, Riches and the three boys, that he followed on in the direction they had taken, fully determined to catch them off their guard, in time, and to punish them terribly for spying upon him and shooting down three of his best men. When Angeline, Riches and the three boys had run so far that they were confident they had made good their escape, they sat down near the edge of a small forest to get their breath again, for all were panting hard from their exertions and hard running, and their hearts were beating like trip hammers from being jaded. Angeline, Riches was to the first of the four to recover her speech and breath, and she said to one of the boys:

"My was it not surprising to see the boy rescued by the three girls?"

"The most surprising thing I ever saw," the boy agreed.

"And they would have griled the boy, if the girls had not interfered."

"Well they rescued him to be sure," admitted another of the boys whose name was George, "but I'm in hopes I can make out who those pretty little girls were."

"Where do you suppose Gertrude Angeline is?" asked the little girl after a pause. "She disappeared from General Mylet's headquarters before we left the camp." Said the third boy. "Perhaps she had to go and therefore may be around somewhere."

"I'm pretty sure she started off in a different direction than we did," declared Angeline, Riches. "I looked over my shoulder as I ran to see how close the other Glandelinian was, and I'm sure from what I saw this territory is swarming with scouts of the rebels. We will have to be careful."

"Then let us circle around another way," proposed the first boy whose name was James. "And perhaps we may have the luck to encounter Gertrude Angeline."

Angeline, Riches agreed to this and they left the big grove, and began to make a detour around to the north, thus drawing nearer and nearer the location of the rebel army again. The wicked old pursuer did not suspect that is change of direction of his fugitives, so when he came riding up to the grove, he passed through it and not seeing any signs of his girl and boy enemies passed on. Angeline, Riches and her boy friends had reached another woods not less than a mile from the other grove when they saw a girl walking toward them and cautiously.

The girl who ever she was moved with great dignity, and with no show of haste whatever, but seemed alert, looking carefully to right and left. Angeline picked up Gertrude Angeline rushed forward, holding out her arm as if to embrace her and calling her by her name. To her surprise the girl who was no other than Jennie who gazed up at her coldly, and upon the boys disdainfully, and not only repelled her with a haughty gesture but suddenly drew her pistol and threatened to shoot them down. She did not recognize either the girl or the boy in their disguise until Angeline picked up her pistol and then Jennie almost sank upon her knees in surprise. She had mistook them for rebel scouts and would have made them her prisoners had she not recognized them just then and apologized for her mistake. She almost felt like weeping when they told of Gertrude Angeline's disappearance and of Angeline Jennings' missing, and of the other boy, and indignantly for it was the cause of general Izner Mylets who had treated her and them so badly. But she remembered why.

"I guess we are all separated, all right," she said to Riches. Angeline picked up gravely in reply, and then turning beckoned them to follow her.

"Can't you think of any way to find them?" asked Angeline picked up pleadingly. "You did Jennie." But maybe we will come upon her like you did me.

"Those glandolinians must have had their hearts frozen in a refrigerator," sighed one of the boys. "I'm awfully sorry this happened, cause Gertrude was so sweet and nice to us all. We can't be, help it that this happened of course, but but it is a dreadful thing, just the same."

"My heart is frozen to all glandolinians," announced Jennie, "Turner, calmly. I only love you and my handy pistols."

"Our luck it too bad," said Angeline picked up.

"Well it may have been our own fault," replied she Jennie, "Turner." And I did not think out exciting times and misfortunes would amount to much at the beginning.

"Our exciting times is greater than we expected," said one of the boys.

"That's enough," insisted Riches. "Seeing we have escaped our own pursuers, let's try and find Gertrude Angeline and her friends."

"I'll go with you," decided Jennie, "Turner." It is evident that the glandolinians may also be trailing after her, therefore we may come just in time to find her and go to her aid."

At Angeline picked up started off, the boys cast one more look to the rear to see if the old rebel was following and seeing no one followed after the two little girls. As they started one of the boys heard footsteps behind him, and up came an unarmed glandolinian soldier all out of breath from running.

"Stop you little devils!" he cried. "I have come to take you back to the rebel lines, where you are to be indicted as spies."

The little party looked at him wondering a moment, then the little girls tossed their heads disdainfully and bidding the boys to follow walked on. But the rebel soldier kept beside them.

"What does does t does this mean you little b fools?" he demanded. "Have you not discovered that a man is your superior and stronger than you are?"

"Yes I have discovered it," replied Angeline picked up. "My heart though is for my own mind. I cannot understand your orders. Go your way my glandolinian soldier, for it will take more than you to make us prisoners." He stopped in dismay when he heard this, but in another minute he exclaimed angrily:

"You Christian dogs must come with me and shall whether you want to or not. I have placed you under arrest. If you now refuse to come with me, it will mean you are do die right here,--do you understand?"

The rebel almost wept with despair, but the girls laughed a cold bitter laugh, and passed on. The rebel caught at her arm the arm of one of the girls as if to restrain her but Angeline picked up dealt him a blow in the head with her pistol butt that sent him reeling into a small creek beside the path. Here he lay for a time, half covered by thick muddy slimy water, dazed with anger and surprise. Finally as the fugitives were almost out of sight the rebel a cross, dripping, and elbowed from the ditch painfully nursing his sore head where the pistol had struck him. The fugitives had gone on, so uttering the words of vengeance upon them he went into the woods and disappeared himself.

Jennie, Angeline picked up and the boys covered many long uses of ground, searching carefully through the forests, in fields and lanes, and everywhere possible but could find no trace of Gertrude Angeline or the other girls. Finally they paused beside a large cornfield, and sat upon the edge of it to rest a while. George took some fruit from his pocket, and some bread wrapped up in paper and gave some to his companions including the little girls. Then he began to eat some himself, for it seemed to be their time for lunch here. While he was eating the drummer boy saw a small dirty piece of wood lying beside him and tossed it away out of his sight the stick landing somewhere in the corn field.

"Hey boy," said a strange voice belonging to a boy. "What do you mean by hitting hitting me in the mouth with a piece of wood covered with dirt?" Then up rose to form of another boy so out, who had been coming through the corn field alone on a scouting tour, and then seeing the two girls and the boys examined them for at first he did not recognize them.

"Excuse me please," said the drummer boy. "I did not know any body was there."

"How did you happen to be there anyway?" asked Angeline picked up eyeing him critically.

Instead of answering he bowed his head a little and stood boldly beside them.

"Ah you are the drummer boy deserted by your cowardly comrades," he said to the drummer boy. Then he turned to Angeline picked up. "And you are one of the little girls who came to Izner Mylets' army with Gertrude Angeline, and Jennie, Turner, the latter who is now with you and who have the misfortune to lose your friends Gertrude Angeline and the boy, and Angeline Jennings."

"Why how in the world did you know all that?" she inquired.

"I know a lot of things," replied the strange boy eyeing her critically as she did him. "My name is Francis Penrod and I'm a scout, and a spy, and everything else besides."

"I believe I have heard of you," said Angeline picked up slowly, as she as she looked the boy over with much interest. "But you used to go along with the regiment of boy scouts under the 'Pivian Girls'. What are you doing here now?" "Oh I do belong to it now," he replied cheerfully. "I have just come over from Penrod's army with half of my company to see if I can be of any help to you."

"Who are you?" asked the drummer boy.

"No Angeline picked up and her friends. It seems indeed they need looking after."

"I'm doing that myself too," said the drummer boy a little ungraciously. "If you will pardon me for saying so sir, I don't see how you can look after any one."

"If you don't see that, you are more blind than a mole." Asserted Angeline picked up sharply. "He's a famous boy scout, drummer boy, and comes from the best of boys out in the world, so he can do most anything. I hope," she added turning to Penrod. "You can find Gertrude Angeline for me."

"I had no time to find her," he answered. "She found me. But who is that old gray-coated man racing toward us here on horseback and shaking his sabre at us?" Angeline picked up and Jennie, Turner and the boys turned around and both uttered an exclamation of fear. It was expected that they all would take to their heels and run fast up the path, for it was the old glandolinian officer who had at last traced them to this place. His anger was so great that he was determined not to abandon the chance of Angeline picked up and the others until he had caught and punished them as he wished. But he was surprised to see when he came upon them that they did not run for they understood at once that one old man was not hing for him. His appearance however was so sudden that he would have ridden them down had they not stepped out of his way but Penrod fired and shot down the man's horse which throwing him, the man rolled like a football in the path.

The glandolinian officer got up and attempted to strike the girls with his sabre, but Jennie, Turner fired a shot that knocked it out of his hand. Then furious with rage the rebel drew his own gun and instantly fired, but did not hit his object and was wounded himself in the shoulder by a shot fired by Angeline picked up. The rebel was now helpless to resist so in a few moments the party left him groaning and yelling with pain. Fearing that the girls and boys would escape him the rebel despite the wound and its pain quickly removed the chance, and disappeared over the brow of a small hill, following the direction in which she had seen them go. Only a short time elapsed before right in their way popped a very handsome looking boy, a head taller than Angelina Riches, and who leveled a doublebarreled rifle at them all and demanded in a stern voice:

"Halt where you are and don't advance another step."

The boys eyes flashed so that they dared not disobey but halted abruptly! and Angelina Riches said:

"Pardon me but you are stopping the wrong ones. We are christians and friends."

"Oh are you sure about that?" retorted the good looking boy in a surly tone.

"That is a question that any one will soon be able to decide," said Jennie, humor herself. "I'm Angelina Jennie's humor, and this is my companion Jennie or Angelina Riches. But who the boys are or their names we do not know except one Penrod and George, and of our better identification we can prove to you."

"Seems to me," said the boy, rubbing his face with one hand and still keeping them covered "that in your case it does not matter--unless you are prisoners already."

"We are not prisoners for you make a serious mistake," declared Angelina Riches. "And if Gertrude Angelina escaped the glandelinians and general Isner Myletze and came back here then I'm sure you are here and her in disguise, and I'm sure you will do me the good favor and stop that fooling."

"The strange good looking boy laughed derisively."

"Tell me, do you take me for a girl?" And he threw off his cap showing short hair. "Why I'm gerald Starring a son of general Manley's boy scout lag ion. And are Angelina Jennie and Gertrude Angelina around here too? Good I shall capture them this time in the too."

Angelina Riches recalling at once that she and her friends were facing the dreaded leader of all the glandelinian boy scouts did not answer at once. They knew that in his ways the boy was perfectly just, and righteous, and was fooled by Manley, and therefore not being wicked, was very daring and not to be trifled with. Then all were surprised to see coming toward them a beautiful girl but she had Starring covered with her own pistol, and she was very much surprised when she saw Starring trying to take the others prisoners but he then covered Gertrude and said:

"We both have the advantage over one another little girl. If I die you die. Neither one of us will give in so might as well be friends."

"You," said Gertrude, still staring at the brave glandelinian boy "must be gerald Starring who I have heard so much about from the civilian girls."

"Oh indeed," exclaimed Starring. "As he examined the girl closely, and you are Angelina Aronburg the famous girl spy of the glandelinians."

"Indeed you know me," said Gertrude almost frigidly. "I am and I also know you."

"What a shame for this meeting," cried the boy. "You girls and boys surprise me as much as I surprised you. One so lovely as you three girls are need no enemies so you need not fear anything. I will lower my gun and let you go. But I suppose if I do you will make me a prisoner."

Gertrude started at the boy and lowered her gun also. She was spared from speaking as Angelina Riches said: "Yes. The fugitives had however been far away from the old man who had run the wrong way, without being aware of their tricking him."

Gerald Starring who really in many ways was a good hearted lad and was shocked at the sudden encounter he had with the girls and boys, and when they would not take him prisoner he was grateful and thanked them as he went off on his own way.

Neither of them at first had noticed the appearance of another little girl, which at the retreat of Starring had skipped off to a hiding place. Not until the rebel boy scout leader had been out of sight, did she appear again and called out:

"Girls, and boys look at me. I'm Angelina Jennie. See what the wicked glandelinian persecutors did to me."

The little girl's voice was shaken to be sure, but they all noticed her, having been startled greatly. The girls looked at her intently a hair's breadth with fear at first, then they took her to themselves and Angelina Riches about wept at her pitiful condition.

"Oh poor Angelina Jennie,--dear Angelina Jennie, what a cruel thing to do!" she sobbed Angelina Riches sobbed. "They have caused you to be in rags."

"Don't cry Riches dear," begged Angelina Jennie. "It did not hurt me any, and it doesn't hurt me now. But it was slightly inconvenient and humiliating, to say the least. I was pursued by glandelinians with blood hounds, and one of them got me and tore my clothes before I shot it dead."

"I wish," said Angelina Riches in an indignant tone, while trying hard to restrain her tears "that I had been with you and I would have given your pursuers a taste of my own anger."

"Never mind," urged Angelina Jennie in a comforting voice. "Such a misfortune does not last long, and as a general thing there is some way to get to general Hanson's army yet. I'm sure we could find it soon."

"Where is general Hanson's army?" inquired Gertrude of Penrod for he recognized him right away.

When Penrod told him her and the others all about Hanson's army taking position near Handglandelinia. He explained to her how the general had sent him and his force of scouts especially to find and help them, whom he knew to be in danger, because of the wily wiles of general Isner Myletze, and of the roving bands of glandelinian scouting parties, and of many pursuers.

The brave little Angelina Riches drew her head down near the little group to listen to their talk and indeed it seemed to interest her.

"I ought to have come here a little sooner with my regiment of boy scouts," said Penrod, regretfully. "But general Hanson's army sent me as soon as he found out through the names of his scouts that you were here, and we're likely to get into trouble with the glandelinians. And now that we are altogether--except the latter boy you are all missing over whom it seems loss to worry--I propose we hold a council of war, to decide what is best to be done to find out why he has sent to general Hanson's army lines in the quickest way possible."

That seemed to be a wise thing to do, so they all sat down upon the green grass in a convenient place, including the drummer boy.

"In the first place," began the boy scout Penrod "this general Isner Myletze is a dangerous adversary and his army has no right to remain in this location."

"That is true," said the drummer boy eagerly. "My companions were chased by his men and--"

"You were deserted by them," interrupted Penrod. "I have found that out also and had detailed some of my boy scouts to trail those cowardly deserters."

"Good," exclaimed Angelina Riches. "At what will we do to get back to general Hanson's army. I suppose we cannot go any other way now but the way we came, unless we have to."

"No of course not," said Penrod. "Therefore it will be our duty to make our way up northward."

"But how with so many enemies standing about?" asked Riches.

"Please give me a little time to think of the matter," was the reply. "I know general Hanson's army is situated near Handglandelinia and that is north of here. I don't know whether in it is safest to go northward or westward, or straight north, I can't say; from the north itself, but anyway my boys are the best that general Hanson has ever turned out into the field with the help of pilot and her sisters and if we give them plenty to do, I guess they will be able to open a path for us, and the result will thereby surprise me."

"Take your time then," suggested Angelina Riches. "There's no hurry as long as the glandelinian glandelinians do not observe us."

"Thank you my dear girl," said Penrod, and he sat perfectly still for a few minutes looking this way and that. And during this interval the drummer boy whispered something in Gertrude's ear, and Gertrude whispered back to the boy. Finally Penrod laughed, and about almost aloud.

"Are you thinking of something now?" inquired Angelina Riches.

"Yes indeed. We will go through the wooded country, itself, for I know every trail and I'll have all of my boy scouts accompany us as our body guard."

"Fine," cried all the little girls clapping their hands together gleefully. "Get how!"

"Leave all the hows to me please," said Penrod proudly. "As a boy scout I must admit without hesitating that I am a wonder. We will first of all write a fake message to Isner Myletze telling him a number of spies are approaching his lines."

and that will make him order back to him when the men of the forest find him. If he does not fall for the trick and refuses to recall our warriors then we will subdue him ourselves and either annihilate them or make them surrender."

"Why try to trick him when it may be impossible to do so?" inquired Gertrude Angelina. "That Gargoylin general is abroad."

"Why we must make the try at any rate, whatever we do," explained Penrod. "It would be very rude to follow our plans without proper notice."

They found it difficult to write a message without paper pen and ink, none of which he was at hand, but Jennie Warner who had been cutting on a piece of stick with her knife accidentally cut her finger, and she herself wrote the fake message with her blood and the stick and decided on their way to capture a glandolinian soldier and have him convey the message or bribe him to do so.

When one of the boy scouts volunteered to go ahead and see if the way was clear, Gertrude did not like to allow any one to go so far from the party. Instead she hinted that it might prove a dangerous mission, but being sent by general Hanson, Penrod as now the acknowledged head of the troop of boy and girl scouts, and he would listen to no proper protest so he himself started ahead of the party to view the country, the others followed him as close as possible but keeping themselves hidden behind bushes and trees, and rocks, where they finally intrenched themselves to await the boy leaders' return. Gertrude Angelina had known this boy scout for a long time, and she certainly had confidence in him as his shrewdness and his wisdom. Gertrude however began to doubt whether he would be safe or not, but nevertheless she could not understand why the boy could be so bold as to scout so far from the main body in a dangerous territory, but he soon returned and was frowning fiercely. He considered the glandolinian general Izner Mylata for all the trouble, and he had during his scouting ahead captured a boy scout of the rebels who had promised to take the message providing he would sprang up. He looked worried as Gertrude demanded:

"What have you discovered ahead of us?"

"Nothing," Gertrude. "I have discovered nothing at all, indeed nothing at all, except one thing." He answered in a faltering voice. "The one exception is that we cannot go in the north for we are barred by a terrible forest fire that is advancing upon us."

"Then why should we remain here?" demanded Angelina. "Go."

Penrod looked first one way and then another as he plucked up courage.

"We got to make a run or trip for ourselves to Angelina Agathia, and by that way entrain ourselves for Haudglandolinia."

"What?" shouted Gertrude. "Go our out of our way and make such a long distance a trip?"

"He non nodded."

Some of the boys began to titter, but the girls were greatly worried. Gertrude and Angelina, who were being expert tree climbers shimmied up the tallest trees to have a look about them. Up there the wind howled lustily, and looking in the north west Gertrude thought she saw something far away which would have put her in mind of a series of volcanic cloud smokes. She realized a forest fire was burning about thirty miles away, and though it really would not reach here, they were barred by it nevertheless. She however had her own decision. She would defy the forest fire, and its maker and go north just the same or go no where at all. She and her friends descended the trees quickly.

"Well," said Penrod. "Did you see what I told you about?"

"I certainly did," said Gertrude. "But north we are going." She decided.

Penrod was very sorry she decided so rashly or in such a dare devil manner but she was not to be turned. She was good, but stubborn, and obstinate, and what she deemed her own cause she would follow if she had to go alone. Penrod then asked:

"What are we going to do next when we reach the conflagration?"

"Conquer it some way," was the reply. "I myself will go alone some distance to make a determination of the landscape and see which way the fire is going, for I'm clever and no fire can outwit me at all, nor can any glandolinian make a fool of me or any of their bullets." But you all follow close by to be ready in case I need aid."

"Why is that?" inquired Angelina. "Go."

"Because I have more stronger nerves than most people have," I do not care what the glandolinians do, and for my own part I would do anything, except two things which is excepted--therefore I do not fear the glandolinians or their attempts to kill or injure me, or the ravages of the forest fire itself. Therefore I expect some way to get beyond or around the forest fire with ease."

"What are those two things you excepted?" asked Angelina. "Go."

"We need not think of them, so never mind. And now if you will all kindly excuse me for a while, I'll go over for about thirteen hundred feet and do my scouting. I need not fear as I'm cautious and can do it. But if I need help be near so you may be able to hear my call."

"You have no spy glasses?" The drummer boy reminded her.

"True," said Gertrude Angelina. "But you have one so I know you will let me borrow it. It is not exactly a proper one which I usually use, but I trust it will accomplish my own purpose."

The drummer boy handed her his own spy glass and the brave girl then saluted all the party, who each go, and as she proceeded leisurely along the way to the distant hills tops they followed cautiously.

I must now tell the reader what happened of the other boy scout scout, since he had wandered away from the drummer boy's tent in the morning, and then encountered rebel scouts got lost in trying to avoid being seen by them. This boy perhaps you may have discovered, seemed to be almost as destitute of nerves, as the very Scarecrow mentioned on the Dorothy of Oz books. Nothing ever could have astonished the boy much at all, nothing even could worry him or make him unhappy. All the good fortune, and bad fortune that did meet him and had met him had always accepted with a quiet forbearing smile, never complaining no matter what happened. This was one reason why this boy scout was a favorite of the girl scouts, and all who knew him--and perhaps also it was the reason why he got into so many difficulties, and sometimes even greater perils than the girl scouts ever did, or also lost himself.

As he was wandering here and there after observing the glandolinians he had observed the walked over hill, and down vale. He missed Angelina, who he and Gertrude Angelina of whom he was so fond, and of the others too, but never less he was not unhappy and felt confident he would soon be reunited with them. Wherever he went now the birds sang merrily, and the wild flowers everywhere were beautiful, and at intervals the breeze had the fragrance of new mown hay.

"The only bad thing about the glandolinians in their generals and vendors, and elements," he reflected. "But the glandolinian country is not to blame for that."

At noon he came to a small farm house which appeared to be inhabited, and where a man and a woman with a little boy lived. They at first thought he was a glandolinian boy scout and would have driven him away but they soon realized from the proofs he had with him that he was an Anti-Angolindian boy scout who was lost and so they gave him a good hearty meal and treated him kindly and with great respect, but nevertheless they did not know anything about the whereabouts of his friends, so they were not able to answer any questions to guide him on the way to the tent used by the drummer boy. So when he left them he felt he was just as bad off as before. Every grove of trees he saw from a long distance, every strange roadway he visited, for he remembered that the drummer boy's tent had either been near the edge of a grove of trees or even the side of a road going through a grove of trees, but always he met with dire with dire disappointment. Finally passing through a small woods, he came out into the open and found himself face to face with Walter starring.

"Hello starring," said the boy scout. "Where do you come from?"

"From a long and careful scouting tour," was the reply. "I've found a way to reach general Hanson's army, at last, and it is at Haudglandolinia and it is not far from here either. I would have come back to you and my friends sooner, to see how you were getting along, had not a bunch of glandolinian goodfollers surprised me and played hide and tag with me, so I could not very well regret your companionship until the chase, hotting, and duels, and excitement was over."

"Can you find your way to general Hanson's army?" "Asked the boy who name was Johnnie Kainer.

"Yes, very easy, for now I know exactly where it is located. I know where are Gertrude Angeline and the rest of our friends!"

The boy Kainer related to the Starring boys about their adventures since since he had left them to scout ahead a great distance, telling of Angeline's pishoo.

Fear that general Izner Myletz's Glandelinians had done something wicked to Gertrude Angeline, and of the escape of the drummer boy, and his being deserted by his men comrades, and how Angeline's pishoo had he himself and the others had been turned out of general Myletz's headquarters. That was all the news the boy had, but it made the boy scout leader anxious for the safety of his best friends.

"We certainly must go to them at once--for they may need our help," he said. "I don't know where to go myself," Confessed Kainer. "I was a fugitive from the Glandelinians too and became lost."

"Well I can take you back to where they are," Promised Starring. "For when I scouted, I had come to a high hill and observed them. That also is how I happened to spy you, just entering this grove, so I ran down and waited for you to appear."

"How can you find them now?" Asked Kainer.

"You just follow me and see. Do you think I have lost their trail so easily? I just know what direction to go."

"I'll try to have confidence," Said Kainer. So Starring and the other went on ward as fast as they could walk and after an hours' travel in traveling they alighted the party of boyscouts and a force of them too, and Angeline's pishoo; the two boys came running forward to meet them. The drummer boy was introduced, to go Walter Starring, who was surprised to find Gertrude Angeline safe and sound.

"How did you escape them?" Asked the boy.

"Why I suspected the oncoming treacherous purpose and outwitted them by jumping out of the window," Answered Gertrude Angeline.

"Can you make your way in the direction you are going?" Asked Starring.

"I guess I can if I'm careful, but a forest fire bars our way," Replied Gertrude.

"But I cannot say what I might do if I cannot outwit the forest fire--which I hope I can do."

"Well," said the boy scout leader. "It is a great pity to be out in this way, and I would like to meet that cruel general and his officers in a smash and punish them severely. You are awfully reckless Gertrude to go in the direction of that conflagration, but I think we can get to Hanson's army anyhow. I know where it is." Then Starring and Kainer were told all about the plight of the drummer boy, and how Penrod had come with his regiment of boys from Hanson's army to help them. The boy Starring seemed rather disturbed when it learned that Penrod had again for a second time had alone to scout the region over.

"I'm afraid he will make a big fizzle over it or something," Said Starring. "And if he encounters any Glandelinians there is no telling with the terrible soldiers will do to him, who seems to be a very interesting party or person. So I believe I'll take a squad of the boys, and take a hand in this scouting myself."

"How?" Asked Angeline's pishoo.

"Wait and see please," Was the reply. "But first of all, I must go ahead like he did--so if you will forgive me for leaving your party so soon again, I'll be off a once and bring him back."

They gave him permission to go, and away he went and soon disappeared with about eighteen of the boys in the direction Penrod had gone.

"I wonder," Said Kainer looking solemnly after Starring and the other boys. "Whether he will ever come back again."

"Of course he will, and so will Penrod and the others," Returned Johnnie Kainer. "Walter Starring is a pretty good fellow, and we can do and on him in anything. And my words Kainer, whenever our friend Starring comes back, there are some Glandelinians if they did, who wished they had not met him..."

Penrod was not a bit afraid to do any kind of a scouting work, or afraid of no enemy whatever. Indeed he rather enjoyed the prospect of exciting adventures. So being far ahead of his friends he advanced boldly. As he had made about five hundred yards he suddenly was confronted by a handsome looking boy in a gray uniform who looked awfully first like one of the Glandelinians in disguise, but who was taller than any of them.

"Who are you?" Demanded the stranger with his hand on the butt of his revolver.

"I'm Francis Penrod, and I command you to either reveal yourself or surrender yourself as my prisoner," Answered Penrod.

"How do you know that I would do that?" Inquired the stranger, much astonished at the audacity of the boy who confronted him.

"Because I have decided that you are a boy scout of the Glandelinians. You must remember that only a short distance away I have a whole force of boys coming this way armed as I am and just as determined, and therefore if you are a rebel it is wiser for you to surrender."

Now when the strange boy heard this he seemed to be much disturbed in mind, for he knew the boy spoke the truth, but no one ever before had come up to him like that and therefore the stranger did not intend to be put out by a mere single Angeline's boy scout if he could help it, therefore he gave a harsh defiant laugh of derision and said:

"It will take more than you to make me a prisoner. Stand out of my way you stranger, and I'll talk about it by and by when we meet again."

But Penrod stopped right in front of him and said:

"I hereby declare in the name of Angeline and God, that you are my prisoner for defying me. From this moment I arrest you as an enemy, and if you resist I'll make a signal and have a swarm of boys down on you in a moment."

The strange boy looked almost fearfully at Penrod, whom he hated in his heart, but now likewise feared, however he was now in a most terrible rage, and Gerald Starring who it happened to be raised his fist and struck Penrod such a heavy blow in the jaw that he went sprawling to the ground. But he was up again in an instant and as Penrod made for him he drew his pistol and fired, but in his excitement missed, and before he could fire again Penrod had him in his strong arms and he pummeled the boy rebel so hard, that he roared with pain as much with rage, and while Penrod called to his own comrades to help him capture the rebel Gerald Starring struggled like a demon, and for a few minutes it appeared as if a prize fight was on. Hearing the commotion Starring and the other Angeline's boy scouts followed by the girl heroines came rushing up, and tried to separate the pair, however they were many against two and soon had separated the two combatants. Gerald Starring stormed and danced around in a dreadful fury, for he had never before been attacked by a boyscout who was an Angeline's boy like this before. Penrod who had finally made him a prisoner ordered some of the boys to rope his hands behind his back, which for six boys was no task at all. Even after he was made a prisoner Gerald Starring could not control his anger. He tried to figure out some way to be revenged upon Penrod, but could not think of anything that could be effective. The captors also did not know what to do so Gerald Starring approached Penrod.

"I'll tell you what to do," Said he. "We can use him as a decoy, and if we are pursued by soldiers we can make him suffer for it."

Penrod was so delighted with this suggestion that he hugged Walter Starring in his joy. He had not been not even attached in his fight with Gerald Starring.

"Of course, it is a good plan," He cried. "The very thing. Why did I not think of it myself?"

So he summoned some of his boys and bade them guard Starring as they would a standard itself and then they proceeded on their way. Before long they had come more nearer to the scene of the distant fire, and it looked as if the woods so far away made enough fuel to burn up the world with so terrible was the conflagration and the flames could be seen for that long distance away--even though it was afternoon and a bright sun was shining here. When all was prepared, Gertrude who was the main leader of the whole outfit, stood on the summit of a high hill enjoying the distant awesome spectacle, and then she sent some of the boys to fetch Gerald Starring before her.

Now the one thing in all the world that Gerald Starring really feared was Angelina Aronburg. He knew she was very obstinate, and that in her very power he would not amount to much. It would not hurt him to be kept a prisoner, but he realized that he was liable to have a meeting with the Vivian girls, especially Violet, and Jennie, who would probably deal with him as he really deserved for his meanness to them. In spite of this Gerald Starring was brave and faced Gertrude Gertrude Angeline like a real hero. He had suffered from a bloody nose, his lip was cut, and his uniform had been partially torn in his struggle with Penrod. When a number of the boys marched him out before Gertrude Angeline, he turned to Penrod with great calmness and said;

"This assault of yours will some day cost you dear, as well as much suffering, and even death, for my friends will avenge this assault upon me."

"Your friends are not here, nor will they know what I have done to you, when you are within the Christian lines and cannot tell them." Answered Penrod in a scornful voice. "You attacked me first, and then tried to shoot me. I had to fight you and you know it."

Gerald Starring was ordered by Gertrude to stand by her, and a number of the boys stood with him. When this had been done Gertrude pointed to the distant conflagration and said;

"No set fire to those woods!"

The boy looked and saw the flames shooting up, and creeping close and closer to the main stretch of woods further beyond, a sea of fire in the distance, and mountains of rolling smoke going high into the air, and forming like a extensive thundercloud. The boy and even all the rest were so intent upon this terrible spectacle that none of them noticed how above the sun had stopped shining and the sky was growing suddenly dark as the smoke spread overhead. Gerald Starring said he did not know who caused the fire, there was a noise in the direction of the forest fire like a dozen moving railway trains across a bridge. When suddenly there was a terrible crash of a great explosion and the powerful concussion caused by the explosion even so far sent a sea of burning embers scattering in every direction, and it looked like a rainstorm of fire descending, but not one burning brand however reached the group of girls and soldier boy scouts. But that was not the only effect of the sudden concussion. Gerald Starring was hurled on his face by the vibration, some of the boys went tumbling head over heels, the little girls had been thrown down prostrate and there was some commotion. A small tree collapsed and fell on Starring holding him down pressed flat to the ground. Penrod himself shot upon up into the air like a rocket and landed on a tree, where he hung by the middle of a lower limb, surprised by the occurrence and wondering what had happened. The remainder of the boys not thrown by the concussion had been jammed close together by the shock of the blast, then others sprawled to the earth. The excitement was great for a few minutes and every frightened boy looked with awe and amazement at the location where the explosion had occurred, and the still descending storm of blazing embers which had been hurled high in the air. It was evident the fire reached some big powder shed and thus caused the explosion. A number of the boys lifted the tree and others dragged Penrod out from under it, badly bruised but not seriously injured and Walter Starring said;

"Well you ought to have some gratitude that even enemies are good enough to save you in time, which was better than too late. You are still our prisoner here and we are determined to keep you, but if you behave yourself during our journey we may be good enough to let you go before we reach the Christian lines. We are using you as a decoy, that's all."

With this another boy picked up Starring's battered gray hat, which had fallen off his head, and placed it back. Seeing that no one was hurt every one started a rousing cheer, the boys tossing their caps and waving their handkerchiefs. The girl heroines who had regained their feet joined the boys in the cheering, for they fully realized that the big explosion had shattered a big portion of the woods, making such a gap that the forest fire was not able to travel southward in course. Penrod had struggled until he finally slid off the tree limb and came tumbling to the ground where he was picked up and held to his feet.

"The tables soon turned." Said Angelina picked up "but it was you Penrod who captured Starring, and from this time you may count me as your best friend." "As soon as the capture of Gerald Starring had taken place, one of the boys who had been disarmed had disarmed the other boy scouts remaining behind with the news, and the order to come and join the party. At once they all hastened toward their comrades. They were indeed somewhat surprised by the startling sight that met their eyes, for there was Gerald Starring, really a prisoner, and all the girls and boys assembled together, and the distant forest fire raging in the distance. So they likewise gazed in great awe at both scenes. Penrod who was standing beside Gertrude now whispered into her ear;

"I thought you was going to take the chance and go in the direction of the forest fire?"

"Not yet Penrod," he answered. "The fire is worse and more extended extensive than I thought, and as you know the direction of the Christian lines, I believe you alone better lead us. As for Penrod I don't really know what to do with him." When she turned to Gerald Starring and looked at him closely and then at Walter Starring who was strutting about, anxiously looking behind him and at the fire in front and she said;

"Do you suppose Walter, that you or your followers, could find a better way to get to General Hannon's army and the besieged town of Handgelandia?"

"Where is that town?" Asked the girl.

"Somewhere northwest of here, I'm sure."

"Then," said Gertrude, "We shall certainly find our way to the Christian army without much further trouble."

"And it will give me great pleasure," declared Penrod. "When we have found our way, we can again see the dear Vivian girls, and then if we still retain Penrod we can take him before the Vivian girls and let them decide what to do with him."

Walter Starring called some of his followers together, and spoke a few words to him in a low tone. When suddenly they galloped almost into the very party from the left, a big column of mounted soldiers--so suddenly, that the girl and boy scouts scattered quickly in order to avoid being ridden down. There was an eddy of dust, and Gertrude only saved herself from being ridden down by jumping behind a tree. They were a party of Angelinian cavalry soldiers and they had come so suddenly that they had not seen the boys and girls in time and barely had time to check the speed of their horses. They were surprised indeed but greeted them joyfully and when they learned of how much trouble they had to find the Christian lines, and how they had been lost so long the soldiers were amazed. The leader told them however that all was safe, for many Christian cavalry troops were scattered all over the state of Ozmania and also Angelina vine, their columns being in every valley, grove, river side, and hill top peering everywhere for rebel soldiers or armies. Finally this party had spied the boy and girls on the small hill top and the leader with a shrill whistle to warn his comrades rode up, but had been so confused by the thick trees growing on top that they had been upon their friends before they knew they were so near. They saw that Gerald Starring was a prisoner among the party and the leader who was a young lieutenant said, said, said;

"Good." And he nodded his head with satisfaction. "Now we can all proceed to business. I believe the Vivian girls would like to see him very much. My dear rebel boy scout, I'm obliged to request, gently but firmly that you undo all the wrongs you have committed to the Vivian girls, and so on or you will suffer the consequences."

"Ah!" cried Gerald Starring, in a scornful and defiant voice. "I defy you all. By my own efforts, I can get away from you if I want to, and I'll make the break even at the risk of my life if you Abbie Annan's soldiers are not careful."

"I think you are mistaken about that," said the leader, and dismounting from his horse he walked to the side of the boy rebel scout.

"Before I went out on this scouting tour, general Robert Vivian gave me some important papers, which I was not to give to no one but Gerald Starring, and only except in an emergency. But I feel pretty sure that this occasion is an emergency, don't you Gertrude?" He asked turning toward the little girl scout.

"Why we have got to do something to make him confess why he persecuted the Vivian girls without reason," replied Gertrude seriously. "Things seem to be in an awful muddle since he showed his enmity to them and he will be worse if we don't stop his persecutions and stop him from doing more harm to the Vivian girls."

"That is my idea exactly too," said the young lieutenant and taking the roll of paper from his pocket he opened it and handed it to Gerald Starring, and pointing a pistol at him at the same time. The boy shrank back at first pale and trembling.

"Oh you dirty Christian dogs," he wailed. "Have you no other slip of paper than that you fool of an officer. Did the Vivian girls demand that of me?"

"They did," answered the young lieutenant.

"Then give me a pencil quick," pleaded the boy prisoner. "Give me one— and for their sakes at least, I'll do anything they ask me to."

"You will do what I ask first," declared the young officer firmly.

"Be quick then you Christian hell hounds," the boy prisoner cried. "Tell me what you command me to do, before I change my mind and then it will be too late."

"You made many insulting remarks about the Christians and called them dogs. I command you to take them words all back, or I'll not let you sign this paper and bring you before general Robert Vivian instead."

Gertrude Angeline who was deeply interested in this strange conversation stood before Gerald Starring. The boy saw her and mumbled something which she did not hear. He seemed to be in a desperate hurry to sign the paper, knowing that he had no time to waste and her very looks itself shamed him for his conduct, for in his heart he liked and respected pretty little girls and so he apologized.

"The pencil," he cried.

"Not yet," said the officer. "You must first apologize to me Penrod for attacking him like you did."

"I can't, it's too much to do that. I can't," asserted the boy with fear.

"You must," declared the officer firmly.

The boy cast a shrewd look at him and saw that he meant it, but with a defiant look he cast the paper to the ground and said:

"I'll die before I do it so there."

The others had looked on and were surprised by his conduct.

"I hate to do it; I hate to do it," he wailed but I will not apologize to an enemy who beat me up like he did. So I must and shall sacrifice this shoot. I'd rather face the fury of general Vivian than apologize to that Christian boy scout."

Penrod was astonished at the rebel boy scouts determination and starring to prove that he was not fooling, took the paper, tore it into strips and set fire to the fragments with a match, and then stood defiantly to them all. Through it all he could see the girl heroines standing proud and erect but with flashing eyes. Penrod himself stepped forward, and with pleading eyes and arms outstretched tried to win Starring's forgiveness but Starring would have attacked him if he had the chance, for Starring though good in many of his dispositions was not a lad easily to forgive any enemy who had struck or beaten him even in a fair fight. He however said:

"Never mind Mr Penrod. Some day I'll meet you and I'll kill you instead of apologize to you. You are aspy and deserve to be hung."

Gertrude looked at Starring and saw that he was more determined than ever. She did not know however that Starring was wishing to be revenged upon all of them, and he mumbled something to himself that they did not understand. But he did not say it loud enough to be heard and Gertrude said:

"On account of your conduct we will not allow you to go free Mr Gerald Starring. You are a fool to act that way and you know it. Believe me if you were wise you would find it more fun to come to our demands than to face general Vivian."

But Starring was at that moment filled with grief and chagrin at being a prisoner and as the party prepared for the start toward Hannous army, he only sobbed and bewailed his fate, and not one was at all sorry for him.

As soon as everything was settled again all the boy scouts were together. Gertrude was standing in front of all the others looking looking radiantly beautiful, and fresh as a new blown rose despite the disguise she wore. On her left side stood the brave drum or boy, and looking sad and solemn, for the boy could not make himself believe that his men friends had been so cowardly as to desert him when in peril. Angeline Pickens and Jennie Warner and the other little girl heroines stood around Gertrude and were much interested in the proceedings. Walter S Starring stood in the center, and Penrod indeed had to regard this vast assemblage of boy scouts of Angeline with awe and wonder.

Walter Starring made a speech to them all. He told how the Vivian girls had been continually and unjustly abused by Gerald Starring, and how he had attempted many times to cause their destruction. So therefore he declared that he held the opinion that Gerald Starring ought to be made to face the Vivian girls alone and let them do as to his punishment.

"But," he added, "It is not for me to decide what you shall decide upon the matter. You all must decide for yourselves, or you will not be contented or satisfied. Choose now what shall be done."

"And most of them except the girls themselves shouted:

"He shall be made to face general Vivian."

which proved that Gerald Starring had made himself many enemies among even the best of Angeline boy scouts and the boys thought they would like it better to have Starring brought before the general himself. But Gertrude Angeline herself shook her head.

"No," said she. "As I am the leader of this wholeband in person, I request you to make a better choice than that. You must choose rightly for many of you I disagreed and that won't make any decision. Which shall it be? General Vivian or the Vivian girls, he shall go free."

The whole crowd hesitated for a moment and then all cried:

"General Vivian."

Gertrude at this moment had stepped to pick up her hat which she had lost from her head by the concussion of the blast and placed it on where it nestled prettily among her soft curls. The boys were cheering and shouting for her. The fact that Gertrude Angeline was their leader pleased them all, especially Walter Starring, who realized it was the most important moment of his life to have her in his presence. All the others congratulated her. The boys however hissed at Gerald Starring and kept back so their uniforms would not touch him. The rebel boy scout was not haughty and overbearing any more; on the contrary he now seemed very meek and in great fear of the fate his captors had in store for him. But Gertrude Angeline and the rest were too happy and excited over their adventures to be revengeful and they offered to do as before appoint Gerald Starring as a guide under escort. But they declared nevertheless that the boy to uphold his honor must promise to be careful and not try anything he would be sorry for. And this he promised eagerly to do and so when the party prepared to follow the Savary toward the Christian camps, he was a different boy than before. To Penrod who had accompanied the girls on many adventures Gertrude said:

"You dear Penrod have been a friend in need, and we all are mighty grateful to you for helping us through all our difficulties. I or the others might have been captured or followed too close by the enemy yet if it had not been for your appearance, and your boys, and I might remark that being lost in a new unknown country and also a fugitive too is not a not much fun."

"And if it had not been for you, friend Gertrude," said Penrod, "I fear I could not have conquered Gerald Starring and made him a prisoner."

"No indeed," she agreed, "you would probably have been whipped by him and made him a prisoner instead."

"And I might have been a fugitive and lost yet also," added Angeline Jennings. "Obligated Penrod dear."

"Oh that is all right," replied Peared graciously. "All good fir friends must stick together, you know in all cases, or they would not be friends? But now since we have the Angelina's cavalry escort we will not have such loss of time in finding general Hanson's encamped army now, where no doubt there will be a surprise party over our return."

"Yes," said Peared's friend after staring. "And it will be very fortunate too."

"Yes?" asked Peared. "Because we need it," was the reply. "But we might as well start on our mission here now is finished and we want to get back to the Christian lines as soon as possible."

"Would you avoid general Hanson's army when you come before?" Gertrude inquired of Peared.

"On I got around the hills with my hand at the time you scaled a high cliff with a long rope. Of course if you wish we can all return by the same way, but it would be a hard journey---and now perhaps an impossible one as it may be swept by the fire. So I thought if we had time to make a wide detour you could all follow the cavalry around and let them lead us to the lines."

Gertrude thoughtfully considered the matter for a while, and then she said: "We must not allow our ranks to break now under any conditions whatever when we make this last trip, but tell me could we get to general Hanson's army to night?"

"What to night?" exclaimed Angelina Pichee. "Impossible. Handgladellina is ten miles away yet."

"It will be a fine moonlight night," said Peared. "And I have found it in many of my experiences that there is never a time so good as right away or as soon as possible. The fact is," she exclaimed, "it is really a long journey to Handgladellina and I and the rest of us would like to reach it before we meet with any more enemies and we are all rather tired now of our day's work. But if we can start on our way now northward, we can get there as soon as possible."

The others looked at one another questioningly. They all however were eager to visit general Hanson's mighty Christian army, and they all had endured such exciting times and such hardships that they would be glad to be out of the region of On Omahin State.

"All right," let's go," Angelina Pichee decided. "But where is he?" just at this important moment Francis Kaiser seemed to be gone, and a number of the boys had to scatter to search for him. He had been standing beside them or the girls just a few minutes before, but his comrades had a most exciting hunt for him and finally discovered the boy standing among a number of high bushes eating a handful of black berries.

"Well, Pichee my girl," he said looking at the little girl when she found him. "This is the first chance since I came out here with Peared to eat any blackberries. And I ate two handfuls already."

"Come quick. We are going north to Hanson's army at Handgladellina."

"Oh what is the hurry Angelina?" said Kaiser but she seized his arm and dragged him away from the black berry patch to where the rest were waiting. They then continued on for several miles and finally came to a stream of small size, and in the twilight they could see in the distance an enormous encampment of white tents extending as far as eye could reach, east of the location of the forest fire, and Gertrude looking through her glasses saw in the camp at many places the dear old flag of Abdonamin flying in the breeze.

"Here we are safe in the Christian territory again," she cried joyfully. "That is a Christian encampment."

"Oh are you sure about it?" asked Angelina Pichee, looking at the distant sea of tents curiously. She also could see the outline of state ly woods beyond the camp and still further the outline of rolling hills, beneath their feet was soft turf, but otherwise the subdued light of the rising moon disclosed nothing else clearly.

"Seems just like any ordinary Christian camp but not general Hanson's." "Yes Gertrude cannot at last....."

"But it isn't," Peared assured her. "You are now confronting the outskirts of general Hanson's army the most glorious Ang-ahin army in the world, and you know?" "No added nothing," Gertrude. "No is your uncle's army here is situated in a part of the quindling State. The region around here is not very thickly settled I'll admit but..."

"No was suddenly interrupted by a rush and a roar and a big column of red coats over doubling bits view almost colliding with the cavalry soldiers and running down the party of boys and girls before they were able to halt."

"Good night, we have rebels captured here," called the shrill voices of one of the leaders. "And they were going to congratulate the Angelinas when they explained to them that they were not prisoners except one boy, and that they were on their way to general Hanson's army. The little girls however were almost ready to cry because general Hanson's army was further away than they thought, but it could not be helped."

"Get it friends," said the Abyssinians a leader, "our boys and girls must not stay out here in the moonlight all night, so let us escort you to our camp as you may have something to eat and a pleasant place to sleep. And to-morrow I'll see to it that you are good friends to general Hanson's army. We consist of his right wing."

"I'm pretty tired," admitted Angelina Pichee, yawning as she and the whole party followed the red coated cavalry over the meadows. "So we had made up our mind if we did not find a Christian camp soon, we would all sleep under the trees, or even on this soft grass."

But the vast camp was not far off. After an hour more they came into it and the boys scouts were placed in a regiment of their own and a tent of the size was provided for the girls, and their two best boy friends while Gertrude starring was placed in a another and attached by two guards. The girls were then led to an officers house or barracks where they were given good food, several of the dishes being smoking hot. The little girls uttered exclamations of surprise and pleasure.

"It's like a fair-land of Oz to receive such pleasure and honor," muttered Gertrude, tending her cap on the hook and seating herself at the table. "This supper smells good and we have turkey though it is not on Christmas. Please pass the muffins Angelina Pichee."

Angelina Pichee thought it was strange that no soldiers or any one but themselves and their two boy friends were in the building just now, but they had no hesitation in eating of the food prepared for them.

"There is quite enough for us here to make a merry feast," said Peared. They all indeed were very hungry and made for themselves a most hearty meal, for not since they had left the Christian lines had they tasted such good food. It was surprising that Walter starring, could eat so soon after his stomach helping to a full hat of black berries and enjoying them all in ten minutes, but the boy scout always ate when ever he had an opportunity.

"Really?" Gertrude. "Really Gertrude," remarked Angelina Pichee when she helped herself to a dish of ice cream. "I believe we are the portion of general Hanson's army tonight. The tents look like him."

"There is no doubt of it," Joana, former name answered.

"I've been here before," said Mildred Maxwell, and Angelina Pichee nodded. "So I know it is."

After supper they discovered the bedrooms as adjoining the big living room of the barracks house, and in each room was placed a comfortable bed with downy pillows looking like a material taken in a raid from some distant rebel camp. You may be sure the tired girls and boys were not long in bedding the two officers who prepared them for them good night, and creeping into the beds, where they slept a soundly until the following morning.

For the first time since they set eyes on the terrible battleship in the river which ran thru them down Angelina Pichee and Gertrude Ang-ahin were free from anxiety and care. The others were not worried about anything.

I suppose many of the readers have read descriptions of the numerous and magnificent array of general Hannum's army, some of his brothers, so I need not describe them in a way, as we are apt to state that no army has any army in any war stricken country ever equalled any of those before. General Hannum's army was lying south of Mandalay, the big Mandalay which was north of the army of tents was almost a big city itself and many of general Hannum's special friends were his best generals, and all those who he have won his confidence and favor for the "beautiful" yivian girls themselves who are in general Hannum's army there were no words or are no words that any one can find in a million dictionaries that are fit to describe their prettiness in looks, features and manners and nature and of mind. Eager to see them in to lose and also be aware of them for their charming faces and still more on charming manners, to know them is to love them for their bravery, generous nature, goodness, and tender sympathy, their truthful ways and their honor. They were nearly as perfect as fairies would be, and they were noted for their wisdom as well as for their many other qualities already mentioned in book after book about them. Their happy boy and girl scouts adore them, and every one considers them their best comrades, and protectors. At the time I write, the best friend of Violet and her sisters, and their most constant companion, was a little Abhimandian girl well known, known and known as Angelina Aronburg or Gertrude Angelina, who had come to the big Mandalay from a very curious manner as a child slave rebel, and had become one of general Hannum's most famous spies in the world. Furthermore Angelina Aronburg had been made a captain of all the boy and girl scouts in the regiments that the yivian girls commanded and was as much at home with them as was they themselves. Gertrude Angelina knew almost every part of the great countries of California and Angelina, and almost the names of general and their army. Next to the yivian girls she was loved better than anyone in all the Angelina Aronburg, for Gertrude Angelina was simple and sweet, seldom became angry, and had such a friendly sunny way that she always made friends among the Christian soldiers where ever she wandered. And no matter what she went through or suffered she always had a smiling face. It was she who brought the yivian girls safely through many a perilous thing as she did from big and powerful Abhimandian, with her sister and Uncle Angelina Aronburg was not like many other girls we know, or like the yivian girls, and though she was wise, she was obstinate in all she did, and at times was rash and full of dare-devil run klaniness and got herself into trouble with the Mandalayans very often. But life as a spy and scout, and heroine, and adventures had taught her to accept all sorts of surprising things and perils as a matter of course, for while Angelina Aronburg was not like the yivian girls—she had seen more wounds and perils than even they had ever gone through. Another girl heroine we all know who came from Abhimandian also was a great friend of the yivian girls, but had not had such chance to be so frequently in comradeship. This was Mildred Maxwell, whose strange and thrilling adventures had brought her to the Christian lines many times, where the Christian generals had always welcomed her. Mildred Maxwell was different than the yivian girls or her girl friends however. She was a shy little thing, and could never get used to the marvelous thrills she went through, but she and the yivian girls and also Angelina Aronburg were firm friends and thought themselves very fortunate in being together once in a while. One day while Violet and her sisters were out scouting they found among the things that enemy fully interested them was the distant rebel positions of general Hannum. The region around Mandalay lines was constantly changing, and Violet and her sisters who had seen events and went through adventures happened in all parts of California felt they were going through another one now. To them it was really a great moving picture of life. The yivian girls were not willing to find out anything very important just now, but merely enjoyed the form and extent of Mandalay lines which were exceedingly curious and remarkable. Suddenly Violet who happened to be looking toward the rear of the Christian lines exclaimed suddenly: "Why there's Gertrude Angelina approaching us." And this drew the attention of the others for they knew and loved Gertrude well.

"Where is Gertrude Angelina?" Asked Jennie yivian.
 "Why she is that girl coming on the horse of yours." Exclaimed Violet. Then she turned to John and asked:
 "What is that thing she is bringing along with her, John dear. A freak horse?
 I never saw anything like it before."
 "I never did either!" Answered John for they all were standing her approach. "I wonder!" Added John musingly. "Why she and her friends dared to venture in the enemy lines under Tamer Hyltas?"
 "Gertrude and her friends will do anything!" Said Violet.
 "Well they may be reckless." Said Angelina. "And how are they?"
 "It is almost bad." Declared Catherine, watching Gertrude approach nearer.
 "Gertrude has some girl companions with her." Said Daisy. "I and they seem to be Jennie's armor and Angelina's shoes. But I fear they had been treated badly by the rebels under Tamer Hyltas, and if they had met any misfortune there before reaching our lines safely as they did three days before it will reflect upon me, for I used to think general Tamer Hyltas was not a mean general."
 "Can't we go and meet them?" Inquired Nettie. "Angelina, Niches and Jennie run under are nice little girls. I'd be sorry if anything happened to them too."
 "Let us wait for them to come nearer first." Suggested John, and so they all had their horses formed into line and waited for them. Their anxiety had been relieved when they had heard that Tamer had helped them through, for they knew at once that general Hannum had sent him to protect Gertrude and her friends. The adventures of their own and of their friends had always proved exciting and very interesting to the yivian girls, but to them it was like reading a thrilling story. Gertrude and her friends are regular troops." Exclaimed Angelina, yivian and Violet answered.
 "They are dear brave little girls, and I'm sure nothing bad can ever happen to them. Gertrude has a fine character too, for she never grows mean no matter what she suffers or has to undergo. They also know that Tamer was a brave and quiet little boy scout, and attended to all the things that the yivian girls wanted done. He was not as powerful a leader as Walter Herring, to be sure, but he could do many great and wonderful things. He proved this by pulling the girl friends of his through many a daring exploit without injury and fitting it with all the comfort I have described in the recent chapters. Seeing that the girls had halted and did not seem to see them, Violet said to John:
 "Oughtn't we to go and meet our friends, so we can show them to our own camps and give them a good time. I'm sure they are really looking for us and don't know how where to find us. And I know if it was me or you my sisters would like somebody to give us a welcome after all our hardships."
 John smiled and answered:
 "For let's go, and away they raced at full speed toward their girl friends waving the "w" and screaming to attract their attention.

Selection of the camp where the yivian girls were was a long way from the portion of the camp where they had entered, but Gertrude Angelina and her two friends began the journey cheerfully and cheerfully, as long as no engagement was yet raging with the enemy there was of no great importance, and they had made such long trips before and knew the reason why. It never mattered much to Gertrude and her friends where she was or what she was doing, the girl seemed to be always content in being able to do her duty, and having good companions to share her scouting parties, her wanderings, and her adventures. As for Angelina, to her and Jennie's armor they now found themselves so comfortable and free from danger within the old Christian army camps and they were so used and amazed by the many adventures they had encountered and at it were encountering, that the journey toward the abode of the yivian girls was more like some pleasure trip than a duty or hardship, so many wonderful things were there to see. Gertrude Angelina had been through many parts of general Hannum's big army before, but never in this location of California, so Angelina, to her happened to be the only one who knew the paths and could lead her two friends.....

and have him taken to the hospital camp. He is shot."
"Yes Captain," she agreed, "there is nothing else to be done. But how shall we be able to find his assailants without any clues?"

"That's easy," said the wounded man, speaking in a rather feeble but distinctly distinct voice. "If you can mobilize some of your boys so that they can trail the men who assaulted me for they are spies. I was a guard by the river front and they attacked me from behind and wounding me with a hot torch in the river."

Gertrude decided to follow the plans, and going to the nearest signal station notified general Hanson by telegraph that spies were within his lines somewhere and to be on the look out for them, and then notified her scouts and soon had them starting on the hunt in the meantime the soldier as being cared for and his wet clothing removed and his wound bandaged by the surgeon who proposed that the soldier remain where he was and not move. After all this care the wounded soldier's expression became more natural again and as jolly as before. The work of treating his wound had consumed some time but when it was positive that everything was alright and that the boys all volunteering would soon have the spies captured the little girls bidding good bye to the wounded man again started upon their journey to find Violet and her sisters. Gertrude having regained her composure after her alarm at the news of the condition and the fact that spies were within the lines and being now in a better humor, despite her own recent mishaps, beguiled their way with stories of her adventures of the Vivian girls and how he came to know them. Angeline, Riches and Jennie Urmer were interested indeed. It was not until next morning however that they found their right way and still they traveled for all day and did not find the abode of the Vivian girls and began to believe the camps were either ornate or changed positions during the night. That evening they came to another big mess hall where the soldiers there prepared for the little girls the same kind of a beautiful supper which was smoking hot upon the mess hall table, and the beds were also ready for them to sleep in. They inquired of the soldiers where the Vivian girls were and they informed the little girls that a change had been made in the camps during the night before on account of suspicions suspected from the actions of Hanley's lines and therefore they were as far from the Vivian girls as when they started. They were told however that the easiest way to find them is to go outside the camp as the Vivian girls went out on a scouting tour every day and so the girls dodged it the wisest thing to do so. They therefore rose early in the following morning and after breakfast went out of doors and there far in the distance they saw a strange group on horseback seven in number but too far away for their forms to be distinguished, so the three girls could not tell whether they were the Vivian girls or some rebels on horseback. They lost no time in riding on that in that direction however being greatly delighted in the hopes of having a new adventure.

"Really," said Angeline Riches, "I think we are having better times than before for everything looks so fresh and beautiful and we ourselves appear so happy as we move on."

"Thanks for the compliment my dear," Gertrude replied gratefully. "I always feel happier when we are to meet our best friends. No one likes to be separated from their friends too long you know, and even good friends separated too long becomes unhappy."

"All things may be good in moderation," declared Angeline Riches. "But let us hurry on or we shall not be able to reach the party on horseback or they not seeing us may ride off in some other direction and make for us a long and hasty and probably tiresome chase."

After the Vivian girls had galloped a certain distance they saw that the girls in the distance had halted and Joyce suddenly halting her own horse, had her sisters to halt, and Violet said;

"shall we stop or do we wish to meet them?"

"No way go on," replied Joyce. "I'll just remain here for a moment until you and they can come up. My horse went lame. I think she has cast a shoe." So they went of leaving Joyce to look at her horse. Indeed Gertrude, Angeline and her two friends we located the Vivian girls in their most cordial manner.

"I believed you would be on your way," said the good and famous girl spy, when they were all back to a point of the Christian camp and seated in the tent occupied by the Vivian girls. "For I had been looking for you for two days and finally learned from a soldier that you generally went out on constant scouting tours, and therefore intended to go out and scout for you."

"I did you have much adventures with general Izner Mylette's Glandelinians, and all his Glandelinians Zimmermannians?" asked Violet.

"Yes, and it is their purpose to come up and make a junction with general Hanley. I think however we would like very much to see him come for he is just the kind of a man I would enjoy to see punished for he played on us a dirty trick, and I do not see in any way at present, for Hanley either to come too near Handglandelinia and capture her."

"Well there is room enough for us all here for the present, I'm sure at that," said Violet. "I and my sisters are also eager to welcome Angeline Jennings and Mildred Maxwell. And it may keep us busy for more than a year at least, getting them used to all the wonderful occurrences of this war."

Gertrude Angeline smiled.

"I have gone through many adventures since the war started," said she, "and have not seen all the wonders caused by war yet."

Meanwhile the other two girls, including Penrod were traveling toward the tent occupied by Violet and her sisters and when they first caught sight of the tent, Mildred Maxwell realized that it was far more grand and imposing than were the tents of the Glandelinian army under Izner Mylette. The nearer they came, the more beautiful and larger the tent appeared, and when finally they came to its entrance, even Penrod was filled with awe.

"I don't see any soldiers to guard the tent," said Mildred Maxwell.

"There is no need for any soldiers to guard the tent of Violet and her sisters," replied Penrod. "We seldom have any wicked Glandelinians in the Christian camps, that we know of, and if there were, or are any, Violet and her sisters are always on the look out and their are so quick with their guns that they are powerful enough to protect themselves."

The two little girls were standing by the tent and he suddenly exclaimed; and the next moment he rushed down the lane and threw his arms around the neck of one of the horses, which good nature naturally permitted in familiarity when it recognized in the boy an old and dear friend, for he had rode the horse often. Penrod's happy shout had been heard inside the big tent, so now Violet and her sisters and the others came running out to embrace embrace their boy friend, Penrod and to welcome Angeline Jennings, and Mildred Maxwell to their own camp.

"We have been waiting for you a long time," said Violet. "And general Hanson Vivian our Uncle has advised us to invite you all to his own headquarters in the centre of the lines. I don't know if you all realize how lucky you are to get the invitation of so great a general, but you will understand it better after you have seen his headquarters."

Gertrude Angeline and the others now appeared in person to lead the party toward the headquarters. The two girls Mildred Maxwell and Angeline Jennings were a little afraid of the beautiful Vivian girls, but gained courage by their winning ways, and by holding fast to the hands of Gertrude and Jennie Urmer.

Penrod who was also always bashful in the presence of so beautiful a group of little girls had no one to help him to feel at ease, so he stood stiffly like a statue and said; "es, ma'am" or "no, ma'am" when he was spoken to and by greatly embarrassed by their splendor so splendid.

Of course Gertrude Angeline and Angeline Riches, including Jennie Urmer had been so much with the Vivian girls that they felt quite at home and were neither afraid or embarrassed, or awed, and they chatted to Violet and her sisters in a merry light hearted way. They told all about their adventures in the domain domain of general Izner Mylette's army, how he had been frustrated in his attempts on Angeline's Agathia as they heard, and of their rescue of the wounded soldier, shot, and thrown into the river by two spies and other things--and then Gertrude asked Violet what had happened within or with the Christian and enemy armies under the Vivians and the Hanleys since she had left and found that all had been quiet so far.

They all passed the evening pleasantly and the whole night in sleep at the in the tent of the vivian girls, and Violet and her sisters were so friendly, and gracious, and also playful with Penrod and the two other little girls that they by degrees regained their self possession, and began to enjoy themselves. Angeline Richcoe already had come to the conclusion that in Violet and her sisters she had found seven delightful and beautiful comrades, and Penrod was now just as much home in the big tent with them as he had been with Gertrude Angeline and the others. At night Penrod slept in a separate tent, for it would not be polite for boys to sleep with girls, though of course in Angelinia that is usually done more than ever in this country. The next morning they all arose bright and early and after breakfast bade good bye to many of the soldiers and officers in the camp. Then they all mounted fine horses, fast going steeds and soon moved briskly away. It was now that the two little girls Angeline Jennings and Mildred Maxwell began to perceive the real splendors of the main christian camps of general Hanson vivians big imposing army for they were passing through a more thickly settled parts of the vast camps and the population of it grew more dense as they drew nearer to the main lines. Every one they met had a cheery word, or a smile for the girl heroines, and many of them remembered Angeline Jennings and Mildred Maxwell, and welcomed him back to the Angolinian army too. It was indeed one of the most happiest parties ever seen more before that journeyed on horseback to general Hansons main lines, and Angeline Jennings began to hope that the vivian girls would permit her and her friend Mildred Maxwell to be always with them, and to never part when they reached the great camps the two were more amazed than ever, both by the concourse of the Angelinian soldiers and officers in their quaint and picturesque uniform costumes, and by the magnificent splendor of the big camp itself. The magnificence of the tents almost took their breath away, until general Hanson received them all in his own headquarters, and by his own charming and pleasant manners and assuring smiles made the two girls feel they were no longer strangers. Angeline Jennings was given a lovely little room next to the room of the vivian girls and told her it was hers until the army was ready to move, while Mildred Maxwell had a separate room and Penrod had the cosiest sort of a room next to his own and overlooking the vast city of big tents. And that evening general Hanson vivian gave a grand banquet in military style and reception in honor of the return of his girl friends, and of the two new arrivals. While Angeline Jennings and Mildred Maxwell had read a lot of the many Angelinians she they had met, Penrod was still more familiar with them. General Hanson vivian went up to Mildred and Angeline Jennings and said; "I know you two little girls having seen you before, but you do not know me, so let's get acquainted." and they did get acquainted, in a very short time, and before the evening was over, the two felt that they knew every person present at the grand reception, and that they were all be their good and loving friends. Suddenly Gertrude looked around and said; "Dear me! I forgot how near Manley is. I fear we will soon see another battle."

"Never mind my dear," said general Hanson with his charming smile; "Our army cannot go too far, and if Manley was not near us occasionally paying us one of his visits he is not happy. He wants a fight and I'm always obliged to give him one." Indeed general Hanson was a very interesting talker and had very polite manners.

Tiring of the length of the lull and of general Manleys stubbornness, and apprehensive on seeing the Glandelinian armies heavily reinforced, general Vivian decided to attack Manley with all his might, for he believed that if he allowed the Glandelinians to lose a respite, they may do something dangerous, and that Manley may gain the upper hand once more. Violet and her sisters had pleaded with him not to attack such a vast Glandelinian army for fear of disaster, but in vain for he was not going to delay any longer longer. Heavy firing far to the right already gave evidence that pontoon bridges were under construction on the Angeline River, and that Glandelinian sharpshooters were firing incessantly and continually, in their efforts to prevent the making of the bridges. The construction of the bridges had continued all the time during the long lull, but now the work was in full swing. The Angelinians being as busy as ants at their work, thousands of long planks across the row of large boats, men tearing their wagons to pieces, throwing the bits into the river, the other men picking up the bits, and now despite the firing of the sharpshooters, bridge after bridge began to grow growing in jerks across the river. The Glandelinian artillery all this time seemed dead, their gunners waiting all this time, getting the lines of the pontoon bridges.

Soon the bridges were finished, there being a hundred of them and the Angelinians now started to cross, never dreaming of those treacherous Glandelinian guns, which let go just as the Angelinians were half way across, swinging with the bridges and breaking in a quaint slow waddling march into a run. Three pontoon bridges were completely demolished, and all that was left of four others, was about three feet of the, on the side where the christian armies were, there was a confusion of horses and men on the landside, the surface of the Angeline river was alive with scores of thousands of purple coated soldi ers struggling horribly to free themselves from the thousands of dead, and the shattered pontoons, and swim to the side.

However many others still remained, while now Baldwin's entire chain of cannon opened a spasmodic fire, thousands of shells suddenly exploding everywhere among the Glandelinians whose batteries soon responded with all their fury, the shells and high explosives coming, and banging and crashing with a hellish uproar and all day long under cover of this incessant artillery fire, army after army crossed the pontoon bridges, and reached the other side. A large force of Glandelinians advanced to repel the christians but after a sanguinary engagement were driven back to their trenches with frightful loss.

Early the next morning August 25th the christian armies were moving across the plains to attack Manley's lines. All of Baldwin's batteries having crossed also had been concentrated during the night, and were now in furious action, the hundreds of thousands of gray coats, saw, coming a stagger, roll convulse and die. Philanders division resisted the christians for four hours, but were cut up and thrown into confusion, and Philander doing all his best to rally his shattered infantry, was killed, hundreds of his officers fell, vast multitudes of his men went down mangled, a mangled and bleeding, and soon the attack of the christian army was in full violence.

Kindernine's camp, and Benligans with Honnie, stormed Manley's center, the firing here roaring like a thrillion cannon. All of these christian divisions were crushed to fragments, all of their generals were killed and the shattered remnants that survived recoiled in confusion being mangled and shattered.

Lovechild Benligans division was disillusioned, Kindernine's Loveshilds was crushed to fragments, Mayfords was mangled, and Shraeders was cut to pieces, the christians retreating leaving 5,000,000 dead upon the fields after the one assault. Then, oh for God's sake Hanson called upon Parobers divisions, which came on facing a murderous fire of canister and grape from ten thousand machine gun, and millions of rockets was added hundreds of thousands upon hundreds of thousands being mowed down, but the monstrous waves of survivors leaped and poured across the outer works in the inferno of battle, a horrible hell bloodcurdling pandemonium such which is prohibitive occurring.

Millions of men on both sides howled at each other like demons, striking at each other, pouring a murderous fire point blank, cutting, stabbing, hacking, thrusting, and slashing like wild savages bent on wholesale butchery, while amid all this was an indescribable tumult of bayonets adding to the din, the Angelinians wavered in the furnace of fire, staggered, broke and ran, but undaunted regathered again, in hundreds of human waves, plunging again into the mighty inferno of fire and smoke, the whole gray line roaring like a thrillion cannon, blazed like hell and it's damnation, the Angelinians again wavered, fell back, rallied again, swarmed upon the first line of works only to go down in scores of hundreds of thousands, a fourth time they were beaten back rallied, swept to the assault again, reaching the first line of works in the face of the murderous canister and grape the torn a tottered and bleeding line with their dead piled in windrows withdrew, only to again rally and rush to the assault like a whirlwind, a tempest of canister and musketry fire withering their many waves, a sixth time they rallied, sweeping within a hundred feet of the position, as far as even as the second breastworks like a whirlwind of flaming flesh and steel pouring over the bodies of their dead and dying comrades in the face of a white-hot roar of artillery and musketry that again seemed to stun heaven and earth.

Ten million of them had made the assault, and when it lulled less than two million returned.

Roswell Euster Johnston and Frantz now swept forward, with their men but as they reached the position they met an annihilating fire, and losing three quarters of their command was were compelled to fall back A. Cronburg being morally wounded. McCluskey Carroll next took his turn, his men sweeping forward with the most tremendous fury, charging six times, only to be repulsed six times with exorbitant losses. General Crowley and Crafts divisions now rushed forward to try it, their whole columns in a hundred men sterious waves rushing forward with fixed bayonets, hundreds of thousands going down mangled and bleeding, Crowley and Crafts being killed and now on the 11th that one morning more than 20,000,000 more christians strew the hills and plains and among them lie ten million (10,000,000) graycoats.

Violet and her sisters all this time had watched this harrowing scene, with brimming eyes, not being able to stand it any longer, as their friend Jack Evans was in the assaulting columns...

The attack of Evans christians was also fierce and terrific and the whole scene was like the maddened hell and its damnation.

The uproar could be heard for 1,000 miles. Evans division however he had made such an impetuous rush that the enemy long his front had given way Evans carrying the works & the loss of seven million more.

Through all the battles din, more piercing than the screaming shells, crash of musketry, could be heard the dying sorrows of countless shell racked bodies, the shrieks, and groans of hundreds of thousands of dying martyrs, the groans of millions of wounded christians curses and blasphemies of wounded and dying Glandelinians the cry of agonized despair, the cry of death being everywhere heard, thousands upon scores of thousands crawling about between but between lulls, blood blinded, pain maddened, with side of bodies shot to pieces, intestines protruding, with armor legs, parts of heads and abdominal walls shot off.

Such revolting scenes filled the Vivian Girls with horror. However on account of Evans the battle was won, for when Evans carried his point the other christian wins being encouraged resumed the assault, and toward evening Manley's army was fleeing southward. For Manley all seemed certainly lost now he realized it. He did all in his power to extricate his army out of the burning city of Hanglandelinia after being driven in by the advancing christian armies.

ANOTHER BATTLE AT HOFFMANN.....

He succeeded in this however and retreated further north, and just as general Vivian thought he had his another great Glandelinian army the great general Isner Myletze silently barred his advance near the city of Hoffmann. A part of general Vivian's army continued its advance unhindered these christian advances so close upon Manley that escape seemed impossible. He retreated and continued to retreat, but finally his exhausted army halted at Plattsburg, confronting this portion of the christian army. However it was no intention of Manley to allow any of his other far divisional armies and their leader to submit to any unconditional surrender under any circumstances, and a day later after a battle at Plattsburg a August 30th 30th in which Manley won a fair advantage, general Vivian almost suddenly surrounding Isner Myletze demanded him to surrender and received this note:

7-591

TO GENERAL VIVIAN
COMMANDER OF CHRISTIAN ARMIES OF GLANDELINIA:

You have recently require of me an unconditional surrender, which I would rather risk the annihilation of my armies than comply with without Manley allowing me to do so. He does deserve all you intend to do to him.

For his massacres of children and the ill treatment of your beloved daughters but He swears that it would take more than God or the devils to make any of us Glandelinian generals surrender our armies. Since you won't give a conditional surrender there is no use for you to make that request, any more for I'll never surrender under any conditions now. You are in the very heart of a dangerous foe infested region, which arising up against you and it won't be long when the whole of Glandelinia will be upon you. And then you will wish you had never made this invasion. We are still the conquerors, yet you don't know it because just now we are worsted.

GENERAL ISNER MYLETZE.
AIDING GENERAL OF JOHNSTON JACKEN &
MANLEY AND HIS SON
TWO CHIEF GENERALS OF GLANDELINIA

General Vivian indeed felt a stung by this note and avowed that the army of Isner Myletze would receive no quarter, if once surrounded, until Myletze is either killed or captured. General maneuvered constantly and swiftly managed by two more days to surround the whole of Isner Myletze's army, and close on it in a strange grip.

For nine days beginning September 10th--10th the wicked Glandelinians fought more furiously against the christians than they had ever done before in the war for the size of their armies, it being the battle of Hoffman. Every attack the christians made was repulsed with the most frightful slaughter ever seen since Ft Francis Atlanta, but by the thirteenth general Isner Myletze had only 100,000 men left. He saw now that general Vivian meant business, but nevertheless knowing that no quarter would be given he forced general Stanok to surrender, while he himself at Manley's orders took to flight with what remainder of the army he could get away. General Stanok however did not surrender but took to flight after the remainder of the army was slaughtered but however the cowardly Glandelinian general did not go very far for the next day he was seized by christian soldiers who constantly followed him and made a prisoner. The whole country of Glandelinia was in a uproar of praise at hearing of this great disaster to a great army of the foe the other Glandelinian armies far off previously mentioned surrendering on March 1916 on the twenty fourth simultaneously. There was indescribable excitement everywhere over the fall of Hanglandelinia Calvernia simultaneously having been retaken by sea and everywhere there was rejoicing, as 200,000,000 Glandelinians in Calvernia having surrendered at Calvernia Run the past April 4th after a months obstinate fighting beginning on March 1st, the Glandelinian army having been 333,000,000 strong.

The nations of the whole world was excited and joyous over the series of enormous christian victories, and papers were sold by millions a day in every city and town of Abbieannia, and the governments made hasty preparations to help Angelina see the war through. Flares swarmed the windows in every street, fire crackers were used freely, cannons boomed, the shells flared and burst, the skies glared with the myriads of skyrockets, and Roman Candles at night, for days, whistles of factories all over the whole world blew all day long, in celebration, Masses said in thanksgiving, Church bells incessantly rang, and the noises of confounding work resounded in every factory and institution, streets were crowded than those watching parades, though parades were held in honor of the victories and little children whooped, screamed, in delight, and even cried in emotion, frightful blizzards of confetti shrouded through the streets, schools were closed, and there was the greatest excitement prevailing.

They realized that now the frightful war would soon be over and having lasted already nearly four years, and were the Vivian girls glad.

I should say they were. It meant for them freedom from the persecutions of the Glandelinians hereafter, and that the remainder of their lives would be spent in rapture and happiness, and that they would soon see their old homes and mothers and aunts once more. And it meant soon that the ruins in Calverinia would be rebuilt, and that children would be free hereafter from the horrors of slavery, in the hands of the wicked

Glandelinians who had not yet been conquered altogether, after after such a long and stubborn war. But nevertheless the eight or nine generals had not surrendered peacefully to their conquerors, except Tenebre and Frankford. Flapper fought at Klose on the very day he surrendered, Henning fought at Clinton surrendered in the evening. May for surrendered on August 6th after fighting at Chillis, Logan surrendered after the battle of Zoe Rae in the evening and Laughington surrendered in the same evening, after fighting all day at Jane Lee Run.

Even all the while general Vivian had been driving at general Manley general Godfrey had also struck suddenly throwing huge armies across the borders finding the Angelinians at Phelanton. He discovered also that the Angelinians had cleared the line of his march of nearly everything the army needed on which to subsist. It had moved so suddenly that the Glandelinian force suffered for wearing apparels well as for food. The advance was made against the christians in disorder and almost in mutiny especially after the evil tidings of Francis-Atlanta.

The suffering was terrible. The start was made with only five days provisions, and Manley being hard pressed by general Vivian was unable to forward supplies and besides now it was too late.

THE OT HER SERIES OF GREAT BATTLES.....

Several actions took place, one at Lena, April 1th and at Elsin May 30th christians carrying all before them. With great bravery in the face of fire of greatest intensity the Glandelinians rebuilt bridges, which had been destroyed, crossed them and drove the Angelinians before them after the bloody battle of Camillia. Francis Schmidt June 1th capturing many prisoners. By May 15th also another christian army under general Christie, was entirely surrounded during the battle of Andersonville, and by the tricks and hammering blows of Godfrey Johnston was enabled to get out of the trap, struck the Glandelinians a stinging blow of violent force, and compelled the Glandelinian general to surrender. Before the end of June the remainder of the Glandelinian army opposing him, were prisoners or in flight. No time was lost by Godfrey who advanced with his combined forces toward Marcucian after a succession of successful bloody fights at Meldonia July 1th and Aronburg Junction July 10th, the Glandelinian force remaining of one million one hundred ninety seven thousand confronted the army of Godfrey's Angelinians now numbering over 12,186,000 men.

Perceiving that it was their intention to cut him off from his advance, on Marcucian, Godfrey Johnston disclosed to his men his own plans, and then gave battle at Marcocellio against Godfrey's Glandelinian army of equal size, his first great struggle in which he commanded, raging June 14th. He lost 1,179,000 men the Glandelinians 2,225,000.

The result was the complete defeat of the Angelinians who persisted in fighting in accordance to the old system, which the Glandelinian general knew how to frustrate. Another Angelinian force lay from Marcucian to Little Evangeline with a force at Angelina Beldon which it was intended to move into Angelina Riches. On June 21th the Glandelinians swept out of the mountains and forests, the coverly being hidden behind the coverly for a surprise. The Angelinian outposts were overwhelmed in sanguinary fighting at Angelina Beldon, and driven onto the plains.

Then followed the simultaneous fights at little Evangeline, again at Angelina Beldon, and Angelina Riches June 21th resulting in a general carnage. June 30th at Jennie Turner, three battles in one month, the fields were fairly drained in blood, the Angelinians won the victories, the Glandelinians withdrew.

On the 4th of July another Glandelinian army under Bernard Dunn succeeded in routing the christians on the banks of the Erminie. Run after a desperate twelve hours battle, and the next day the latter were in hopeless confusion, but on July 11th Godfrey Johnston arriving at Cedan Calverinia halted the panic stricken christian forces, threw his whole force upon the enemy, and the Glandelinian victory turned to complete defeat at Cedan.

At the same time and same date the Glandelinians under Souller defeated with great loss Marcucian christian army at the frightful battle of An' Angelina Francis. And at Vivian Francis on the 30th of July, though the tactics of the Glandelinians seemed to be much superior there was a moment when their defeat during terrible battle there had not the christian right wing been rolled up, and the news of the christian defeat at Marcucian June 18th came in time to demoralize the Angelinians and put them to flight. The defeated forces spent the night in retreat toward Marcucian. Godfrey of the forces pursuing he learned that an Abyssinkillian force was gathering on the northern frontier to aid the Angelinians and bring a speedy end to the war. Anderson Leon was sent by Godfrey to meet them. Godfrey himself advancing on by to encounter conditions different from those he had heretofore met with.

There was no good roads, and the country was desolate, by recent storms of war devastations, previously mentioned during the last recent Calverinian campaigns. By July 2th Leon had pushed on to Sacramento, with the remainder of the army following close behind.

Sacramento was reached on July 30th Godfrey pushed forward troops as fast as they could be organized, many of them militia regiments thrown together. Ten skirmish battles, and twenty unsuccessful small general battles were fought around Josephine August 8th and then began what was called the fatal Handonka campaign, in which the Abyssinkillian armies with some Angelinian troops, numbered about 21,700,000. By August twenty seventh Godfrey prepared to cut off the communications of Abyssinkille, with Angelina, and Abbieannia.

The Glandelinians closed in on the two foes, but Costello had been delayed by bad roads, and severe hurricanes, and when Erminie delivered the initial attack the Abyssinkillians reinforced by the Abbieannians and Dombobians gave battle August 21th at Pyrohen and Costello's Glandelinian forces were annihilated, both sides being exhausted, and drew off the battle being a draw.

Norden who was besieging Sacramento compelled after sanguinary fighting August 29th Cardinals Abbieannians and Tripolygonians to capitulate, but not without horrible excruciating losses. Then the main Abbieannian commander made a southern move and attacked Frank Costello at Mc-Hollester Run, pushing his back after one of the fiercest conflicts ever seen raging August 1th.

Then the Glandelinian Godfrey took a hand and cut the Abbieannians off from the seaboard, and great reinforcements coming up the christians retired gradually into Zimmermann Run, where Godfrey with the main body of his army fought another great battle on September 1th the slaughter at Zimmermann being terrible on both sides. A big body of the Glandelinians retired, but never nevertheless the main force of Glandelinians won the battle, the christians being overwhelmed and retreating hastily.

The Glandelinians crossed the Angelinian River the whole of the Angelinian country then arose, seized after a battle the Glandelinian navies at Vivian Wickey September 10th struck against Dupond with their land forces, defeating the foe in a battle thereon the same date and captured the whole Glandelinian army, thus upsetting Godfrey's plans, and he was still more disconcerted when the Angelinian and Abyssinkillian forces under Cardinal Costello compelled all the Glandelinians army to leave the Angelinian country even without a battle. Things now began to turn against Godfrey.

Angelina was coming in full strength, and the Abbeinnings and the Tripolygonians seemed almost as unshaken as ever. Receiving more reinforcements he began his desperate Angelinian campaign and soon entered Angelina. By the last of September 1915 his whole army was concentrated between Andean, Bondinia, and Andenia. After some encounter and mistakes at Fillman Malanie, September 30th on both sides a serious engagement took place & Callie two weeks later October 21st when if Godfrey had followed his own judgement, the result would have been decisive, instead of which he rested his men, and the Christians escaped.

The next day while pursuing the Christians Godfrey received his first wound. Later October 20th the Glandelinians were checked with heavy loss at Mildred Maxwell, but Godfrey turned about and led his army into St Ann, after a nine days siege and battle beginning November 1st and ending on the 9th. Nine days later November 18th Godfrey was defeated at the battle of Andean which raged three days. Retreating toward Calverine Run the Glandelinian army huddled together, disheartened and despairing.

But Godfrey ad reinforced by five armies again engaged the Abbeinnings at Catacc, November 28th and then on gaged the Abbeinnings, Angelinians, Dondobians, and the Abyssinians at Grandburg, on December 10th in two of the bloodiest battle ever.

Terrible was the carnage on both sides, but the Christians were compelled to retire. These events had done much to shake Godfrey's fame as a great military genius, both in Glandelinia and elsewhere.

The shadow of his days had begun to lengthen and his enemies by general Vivian's progress also in Calverine at that time to take heart. His losses had been tremendous, the drain on the manhood of Glandelinia had been appalling, and Calverine, Abbeinnings, Angelinians and Glandelinians were horrified that Calverine was drenched with the blood of the many battles during the long and sanguinary war.

On December 25th his whole army was concentrated on the Evangelia and numbered four million four hundred thousand. No sooner was the Evangeline River crossed, then things commenced to happen, and to go awry.

The cold of the winter was intenser than the one before, diseases despite the cold appeared on account of the plague then let loose by Manley, and thousands continually dropped by the wayside. Officers wilfully neglected or disobeyed orders, discontent spread, and the cold killed or disabled scores every mile of the march. The horses suffered, went mad, stampeded and died. There were no roads now but fill fields of deep hard snow and the armies at times either got out of control or failed to make headway on account of the depth of the Calverinian snows.

Then the shadows gathered still more. The Christians retreated in many divisions drawing the Glandelinians further and further on without giving them a chance to attack.

The divided Glandelinian forces unused to winter as their lives were spent not mostly in tropical regions now became almost bewildered. Blizzards assailed them it seemed as often as the waves of the sea assailed the breakwaters. And to make matters worse, they had never experienced even these new tactics of the Christians. They had been frustrated seven times in attempts to give battle at Bennelina. However Curran and Gielow caught up with two columns entrenched behind breastworks on the banks of the frozen Erminia Run.

But here again they were outwitted by the Christians who escaped by night, and were well away before they were discovered. The Glandelinians at last overtook their seven enemies where the Andean road was cut by the frozen Calverine River.

The result was a drawn battle at Mc-Farren January 14th nineteen sixteen but 11,138,900 fell on the side of the Christians and 22,225,000 Glandelinians fell. Godfrey was present but he did not direct the bloody fight. The advance guard pushed on after the retreating Christians allies, whom they found leaving the region of the Calverine river. That night when the main army came up they found that the city of Logan which they had taken was in flames. His march 1 marshalls observed that a strange apathy had seized Godfrey. He had lost his heartiness and was frequently ill. His old tactics which had won him so many battles here seemed absolute and useless. At Logan he apparently did not know what to do next. Word also came to him that distant divisions of his army were facing much larger bodies of fresh Abbeinnings some of these scattered divisions being fifty or a hundred miles apart. He assumed the offensive at last and at Rodin on February 25th attacked the Christians in one of his most terrible battles, but was beaten at every hand, and with his broken and cut up army was enshrouded in darkness and defeat.

Then began that retreat from Calverine, and footsore they rushed on harried by the Christian allies, who killed the misera 11 men who fell behind in the general rout. Depleted to 1,700,000 men the Glandelinian army was obliged twice to give actual battle to the allied Christian allies. Nelson in a heroic attempt to break through the surrounding enemy at Janie-Wron-Town lost 117,850 out of his 198,000 troop troops. This battle occurred on March 21st being a slight for victory. On the same date there was a severe and sanguinary fighting under Henry, Tom and Frank St. Clare at the crossing of the Angelina but the total number of available men of Godfrey's army was now less than 311,000 and reduced to the last stages of despair Godfrey after fighting fiercely for four days at Collins March 31st to April 3rd surrendered the remainder of his army, and the three St. Clares who fought on April 5th at Jennie-Wron Town also surrendered that very evening. None of the battles were won but by the foe. Through the entire war up to this time there were about 565 battles and incidents, both sides predicted to have won an equal number of battles though now the Christians were really winning the entire war. Violet and her sisters who were with the army now concerned before the three Manleys at Mc-Allister run were happy over the results and wondered what would be the next issue.

It is as stated as far as known there are 434 Glandelinian generals mortally wounded, seven hundred ninety four were wounded, and one thousand fifty two were killed up to this time making a total of 3,434 in killed, wounded and captured, twenty five also having surrendered.

It is probable that the whole Glandelinian loss in killed and wounded in private up to the battle of Mc-Allister Run coming in the next chapter in including those taken as prisoners, is 478,000,000 most of course of which were prisoners, who were retained by the Angelinians as slaves, until all the ruins were repaired.

There are many battles where the Glandelinians suffered extreme losses and indiscriminately heavy, but these battles like Anni Francia-Atlanta and others have been so exasperatingly fierce that the losses have either been prohibitive, withheld, or are not correctly known far enough to be stated though the Christians won so often.

Up to this time in the Glandelinian service there were about 3,390 Glandelinian generals, four fifths of which survived the war, among those 3,390 named.

Of the losses of general officers on the Christian side, three hundred two were mortally wounded, seven hundred ninety eight were plainly wounded, and nine hundred eleven were killed, making a total of 4,647, while all officers of all rank, in killed and wounded are 27,193. In the whole war up to now about 200,781,199, Christian soldiers were killed wounded or taken prisoners, and these prisoners had been given up or retaken which reduced the loss of prisoners to '0'.

Total number of Christian generals in service was 3,283. There were six other Glandelinian generals including among the ranks making a total of 3,396 altogether. Total combined of both sides makes 6,679. Both sides lost almost equally heavy in their highest general officers, but the Christians quite heavier, totaling the death list though in the main loss it is estimated that the Glandelinian was three fourths greater.

CONCLUSION OF CHAPTER.

BATTLE OF MC-ALLISTER RUN.

"Oh Evans did you see any of the great fighting that is going on at Mc-Allister Run?" Asked Violet. "We can hear it but are too far away to see any of it."

"No I don't remember seeing anything of it yet." Said Evans. "Though I have heard a good deal about it. There is ardent proof though and hear that the battle now rages between Hanley and your father as nearly as bloody as Gloriana Francis and some how is producing a concussion as severe as Francis Atlanta, though it is not creating so much damage."

"Is the battle of equal violence throughout the whole line?" Asked Joice.

"It is probably true that the battle has the greatest violence at the center." Said Evans. "But nevertheless it is now terribly violent along the line. As I heard the Abbeian line of fire is sweeping the fields with such destructive fury that it is destroying men in a far worse way than deluge of flames could have swept through the streets of a city. Even if the ocean could have been in such fury as to drown our islands, sweep away our massive cities, and turn the world into one desolate plain like the moon I'm sure it cannot make the battle like this battle is doing."

"We are not in danger any just now but we can hear the battle from here very plainly." Said Jennie. "The noise we hear sounds like millions of thunderbolts at a far distant distance. At first we did not know what made the clamor, and believed it was an eruption of Mt. Calverine we heard."

"I thought you little girls were or a few with general Vivians army now." Said Evans.

"No we are in his now but too far from the battle to see it." Said Violet. "We were in Wienstein yesterday, and the others with the day before but not in general Vivians army. One of the officers told me this morning that it is one of the most shattering battles of the war that is now raging, and that it is going to be most decisive in its consequences. There were many great series of shattering battles that we did not see, and of which we are glad too. They were horrible. I shall never forget this."

In the meantime Mc-Allister Run is situated south of Calverine north of little Francis. The frightful battle to which it gave its name raged over a territory about ninety miles, from north to south, and six miles from east to west, a territory diversified by a succession of large and low hills, with intervening valleys, woods, several small villages, and many farmsteads, with massive stone buildings, serving as improvised forts and pivotal points around which the bitter combat raged.

Here amid the vines and trees of all kinds, and over fields desolated by shell fire was fought for eighteen hours, the greatest contest except Francis Atlanta and Gloriana.

Hanson Vivian, Viviana, Huce, Wiensien and Frank Hansonia with general Vivians adding brought into action over 138,000,000 men under the supreme command of Hanson and Robert Vivian. Their artillery numbered 366, 666 pieces and they had 10,188 squadrons of cavalry. The Landelinians under the three Hanleys combined numbered 129,000,000 men and had 129,999 cannon and 89,000 squadrons of horses. The Christians therefore had a slight advantage in the number of troops, while the Landelinians who won the battle had a great advantage in position and were also superior in artillery and cavalry.

On both sides the battle was unexpected. Though there were 270,000,000 men in close to each other on the night of the fifth, though their outposts were less than a quarter of a mile apart, and even within speaking distance of each other, yet so poor was the scouting, and information service of each army that each was unaware of the other's position.

The two armies unexpectedly stumbled upon each other and only after several hours of severe fighting did the magnitude and range of the conflict in which they were involved dawn upon them. The disasterous clarity of the battle occurred when the driving Landelinian onslaught wiped out one of general Vivians right wings, but the mighty general had heavy reserves which were thrown upon the foe, and though checking the desperate onslaught, seemed impossible it was accomplished in the end, by the Abbeian line and Landelinians reckless of the horrible cost, straining every reserve and nerve in this great battle of the war until scores of millions had fallen. The struggle was obstinate, though on neither side was there any general direction, each corps commander, fighting his own fight as best as he could. Only when the battle had been long under way was any concerted plan enforced. Then general John Hanley, and Hans on stood it out against each other conspicuously for their part in the general melee.

For every great wave of gray that broke against the Abbeian line a terrific tempest of destruction either tore them to pieces or wiped them out, first clouds, of shell, then torrential rains of grape and canister and with the canister came grenades and hurricanes of bullets. Rendered almost frantic by their losses the Landelinians finally ceased their storm of assault for a few hours. Vivians army or Hansons either was in no condition to pursue having been fighting already for eighteen hours and visiting the Mc-Allister Run part of the battle field the great Christian general Hanson had been horrified at the losses. His losses as papers reported were enormous. 17,000,000 dead were found, for thirteen miles, besides 18,000,000 seriously injured, 19,000,000 fatally injured and 30,000,000 slightly wounded or disabled for life. Over 22,567,388 of the Landelinians were found dead. Poor general Hanson had seen the hideous meaning of such a frightful storm of Landelinian onslaughts, for the sight of the seas of the dead wounded and dying, and more terrible the shrieks of the wounded who were lying by the millions, unattended, uncared for, under the brooding sun, affected him most profoundly.

"The poor people, the poor people, what a horrible thing is war of this sort." He was heard to say more than once after many weeks after his terrible battle. Wienstein too like general Hanson and even Vivians were horrified.

"I would sooner lose my life than be present against such another horrible spectacle." Said general Vivian. The papers had been full of the horrible battle story describing the heart rending agonies of the night of the sixth of July the frenzied hunt for water by thousands of soldiers, who having come through uninjured had been lost during the conglomerate rout in the wild regions of devastation, and whose thirst was so intense that they drank from muddy or bloody pools, or pools filled with clotted blood, the horrible cries that pierced the silence of the night, of the wounded of which there was few to attend, cries always for water cries full of indescribable anguish.

Who will be able to tell the horrible tale of that harrowing night. As the papers also stated the rising sun of the seventh revealed one of the most frightful spectacles the imagination can conceive. The battle field was everywhere covered with bodies of men shot to pieces, besides horses, the highways, the ditches, the ravines, the thickets, and meadows were sown with dead bodies shot to pieces, the environs of Mc-Allister, and Mc-Allister Run were literally heaped with them and horrible torn with devastation.

Forests were horribly gnawed and torn, millions of trees were splintered, rendered leafless, and everywhere was wreckage and bodies. But happy were the dead for their suffering was over. But it was with the half dead the wounded, the shattered wrecks of the ghastly fray in whom however the vital spark was still active.

When light in the afternoon the battle was renewed it was terrific the Landelinians attacking with such redoubled fury that it was impossible for the Christians to stand their ground successfully at any point, though Williamshurger, Jammersmann and Acknell joined in and finally a disaster occurred which resulted fatally for the Christian cause and the lost of the battle.

It is really known by all historians what generals Sherman called war. But what can this war be called? And who would give it its right name? Violet and her sisters called this war "The scourge of God upon Glandelinia and Angolindia combined." Hanson called it something that would not be found in any book or dictionary! So did many of the other Christian generals. It is true that great disasters have occurred in this world and elsewhere from time to time, earthquakes, storms of destructive character, plagues, and so on, volcanic eruptions of disastrous consequences and everything else that has been read of and explained. Well the war itself has had everything that could happen, except typhoons and other windstorms, which had been caused by the war also in many cases. Earthquakes brought on by gigantic explosions, by the thunder of legions of battering of cannon, gigantic floods that surpassed all the other disasters known, and terrific forest fires which would only take the witness to realize how horrible they were.

Soldiers, children and so on had experienced every intolerable event of this titanic war, children had been assassinated by the glandelinians in a way that would not be fit to be pictured either in plate or motion graphy, and such terrific explosions that a million dollars spent by one motion picture firm could not produce. Disaster upon disaster, horror upon horror, the suffering of innocent nations on account of the hellish blockades of Calverindia sea ports and rivers, the Christian sorrow, at starvation, and diseases which had been caused by the enemy, thousands of gigantic conglutinations in one day scattered over the scenery, either in forests, in oil fields, and cities and towns, great volcanic eruption, the blasting of places of volcanoes, the ruthless destruction of farms, and the scores of battles raging everywhere in less than a day's time.

Disasters by a hundred score occurring in every battle slight or severe, and not more what nature itself seemed destined beyond her own helplessness in this titanic war, and the roar of conflicts had continually brought on the most violent weather that Calverindia had ever experienced in summer, and in winter so much snow fell that the Arctic regions could not boast of it. Hanson on the delectant with correspondents on the fury of the war and its intolerable devastation and desolation said:

"People call war hell, but I do not. War is a blasphemy of all living creatures, the world itself in general and also of heaven and earth. A war like this is one in a score beyond the limit of region when such an enemy like this devilish nation hordes a Christian country. When this damned war began and was started by the Angolindians themselves I did not think it possible that the glandelinian militarism was so strong and neither did I think that the enemy would ever invade the country of Calverindia.

Des its our defeats and disasters in the southern soil of Angolindia in the earliest part of this bloody war the glandelinians met too strong an opposition to be able to make any sort of invasion of the Angolindian countries, and while they finally fell back toward Glandelinia whether they won battles or not immense armies of these damnable Glandelinian savages of hell immediately poured into Calverindia by sea, striking back the Abbie annian fleets that came to oppose them and started a regular hell of destruction where ever they went. Of course this was the cause of so many Angolindian armies being rushed into Calverindia as fast as possible, and though we wrought a storm of terrific battles, a scene of battles which shocked the whole world off their very feet, we are still here resisting an invasion that it seems the very heavens full of angels, nay even the angelic messengers could not stem. War by many has been called Hell but I do not call it hell. In fact hell with its intolerable horrors, and so on is only a tame cat compared to this dreadful horror. Hell has to place here, and if it was here, it would literally flee from the horrors of this greatest of wars. I since a boy have seen many disaster, disasters, disasters, caused by great earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and the like, especially the great typhoons which have swept many regions. I have seen even the terrible Pelee disease disaster, the Lisbon Earthquake, and all earth quakes that have occurred in the countries everywhere, and observed the dreadful loss of lives occasioned by these troubles. But they are not hating at all compared to this war and the devastations the enemy, and the battles have caused. I have in my list over 200,000,000 men though still able to fight in this war and not injured yet cannot hear having been rendered deaf by the dreadful dreadful volcano of flames and din of the many pugnaeous battles they have went through throughout their services. It was my intention when I started the war on the Glandelinians to immediately crush the foe back from Crowley and Jennie Wren, invade the enemy's country and bring them to a speedy submission, but this was a failure not through any reason known except the devilish hellish resistance that the Angolindians gave the Glandelinian armies though very inferior to the Angolindian forces as they were.

1895 It is my rising; indeed that the glandelinia is cannot be sent back as easily as I thought, because it is impossible in any cases for an enemy of God, and for the wicked to impose upon God. But in every battle almost the Christ an armies which have been overruling to that of the enemy have been vanquished as to any and there is no telling whether we will win or lose. For my part I'm perfectly sure that we will not lose, but that we have lost a already, but we won't stopping step fighting on no conditions unless annihilation faces us."

During the great florinda campaign which was going on there was one of the greatest floods which had ever occurred in the whole war and which in two weeks times had covered about nearly three hundred and seventy five miles of land in water inundating far as and almost covering the half of eighty feet in some places. The glandelinians had caused this flood by bursting a large large number of dams and levees and the flood had happened with the suddenness of a great tidal wave, and the rush of waters had crushed the houses of many towns and vile villages, and even the great sections of great cities and all the vicinity. Thousands of bridges had been washed away, all the rail road lines were smashed by the flood, and the loss of life was terrible. The list of cities that were wrecked by the floods and the loss of life in each are as follows:!!!!

he The total loss in property was 343,698,260. The number who were drowned by the flood amounted to near five hundred thousand besides three hundred thousand who perished from privations, exposure, diseases following the floods, and by cold and starvation..... Scores of other great cities were menaced by the raging floods but fortunately were not badly threatened, and in some of the cities the water only rose to about the depth of two feet. It would almost seem impossible to think of all the great disasters that had occurred in this great war. Ships on the sea could not dare face the submarines and other mancoos of the sea like the mines and Glandelinian warships, and all nations looked on in horror at the frightfulness of the war, which they had thought at first when it started that it would have been only an insignificant struggle not worthy worthy of attention.....

In the meantime two great christian armies were concentrating in general against the enemy. One again was concentrating against the enemy at the place called Little and pig girl knool, and another was concentrating and forming positions along the banks and in the province of Mary Mc-Allister Run. During this time violet and her sisters had many experiences. They had been chased by the enemy a dozen times in one day, saw thousands of fires in one week, and also saw a number of explosions, were caught out in heavy skirmishes, in big hail and thunderstorms, and also experienced an earthquake that was caused by some strange explosion. Once they were trapped in a burning house, and were rescued by soldiers, and once arrested by the Angolians when they were returning from the enemy lines in disguise having been mistaken for spies by the enemy.

Then when in retreat in the stream of the Mc-Hollister Run river they had been attacked by a number of glandelinians and would have been seized and carried off but a large hideout which had been waiting in the river at a different time and at a different location came to their rescue and attacked the glandelinians with terrific fury, killing a number and causing the others to scatter like the leaves before the hurricane. Great and awful events of the war was also occurring. A great number of fortresses had been seized by the Angolians, some rivers were blocked, large ferries were blown up by the enemy and innumerable adventures were occurring by soldiers. The enemy were concentrating in great numbers against the christian army under Juddon who was trying to lay siege to Big girl knool with the intention of trying to capture it, despite the fact of the severe failure that general Vivian met there sometime before and also great activity were starting at Mc-Allister Run, and it was evident that a great battle would break out at that section before very long.

The enemy generals who commanded the two armies at this point was very worried over the situation for though before the war was going well on their side, but now things were rapidly changing, and it seemed possible that before long something would happen that would be terrible to the glandelinian cause. The work of building trenches at pig girl knool was swift and done by hundreds of thousands of men, great batteries were being placed, and it was intended to bombard the christian lines as soon as all preparations could be made to prevent the christians from attacking too soon.

All the two christian armies were also very active, because they were not going to allow the enemy to get ahead of them, and they had erected more of their batteries of artillery and trenches before the enemy had half of their work done. Nevertheless the days was just now so rainy that there could not evidently be any serious artillery activity as yet, neither any engagements of any sorts, though small sorties, and raids were very frequent. The enemy's activity was splendid but nevertheless they could not even in the fair weather incur the christian armies from attacking, and the glandelinian commander who had found out the strength of the christian positions and the artillery and works by means of spies was really afraid to make the attempt of starting a battle himself.

The glandelinians indeed were becoming more dreadful in their fury and the enemy armies seemed also to become more strong also. The forces of the enemy now defending the captured Big girl knool was a stronger one than that which had fought general Vivian and Hanson so long ago in the first great conflict there, but then the christian army confronting them was under general Hanson's Vivian and this commander was a fierce and dreadful adversary to contend with, and so the reason why the glandelinian commander was compelled to hesitate. Never did the enemy army hold so long before in any given location without either starting an engagement and without even daring to make the least venture forward from their works. It was evident that the glandelinians now at pig girl knool did not wish to fight and would have been only too glad to fall back but that they were unable to do so just now for the fact that the christian army had almost overlapped their wings, and that they were half surrounded by the biggest christian army in this location of the region of war.

At Mary Mc-Allister Run the enemy though heavily reinforced by another glandelinian army consisting mostly of guerrillas and others were more quiet and inactive than the glandelinian army at pig girl knool, and though the christians set the forest on fire in the location of Mc-Allister Run with the intention of causing an alarm to the enemy it had to effect, and only the portion of the army that was in the path of the conflagration withdrew to better cover, and encompassed a portion of the christian line at that section and caused a slight retreat of the Angolians. So thus events of the war was following quick and fast.

While the vast glandelinian army was concentrating itself on the fields before before Little and pig girl knool, many but also of wicked glandelinians proved themselves once for all the worse enemies that the poor unfortunate plangiglooman creatures had ever seen in their existence. The glandelinians knew that the creatures were located in the hills near by had raided upon their domains and polluted the water of streams and pools so that the creatures could not drink it, and also ruined everything growing in the neighborhood, besides tormenting the helpless young, and mistreating them as much as possible.

It was the intention of the glandelinians at this location also to massacre about 10,000 children whom they had recently captured from the town of Sanders, and so to the very location of their misdeeds to the plangiglooman creatures the glandelinians brought the children to be massacred, very unassisted.

It was the purpose of the wicked glandelinians to kill the children after nothing out to them the worse tortures that the worse wicked can ever think of, and so the children were first lined up and then tied to trees which the glandelinian officers officers had picked out for the purpose. Of course the poor children were too frightened to scream, or plead, for they had heard of the cruel massacres of children committed by glandelinians before and so they had no word to utter so complete was their fears. Violet and her sisters had been spying in this location however without much success, and they had been on the point of returning home when they saw the scene presented before them. At first violet and her sisters being good at figures had counted exactly ten thousand children to be slain, but they could not believe their eyes when they saw all at once a multitude more of childish faces and bodies, which they could not conceive how the glandelinians had obtained them. Surely the glandelinians had not power to create a greater number of children to be slain. However their surprise was still greater when as the glandelinians sorted out to commit the slaughter advanced toward the children tied to the trees, and who were about to lay their wicked hands on the helpless children, when what appeared to be extra children suddenly sprang upon these glandelinians literal small plangiglooman creatures of the demon reborn in the skin of violet and her sisters could hardly stand the ear-splitting din these creatures set up as with their pretty faces contorted to fiendish hideousness, they fairly crushed the glandelinians in the powerful coils of their long armored tails, and hanging others down to mangled heaps with their claws. The other glandelinians still at large fired upon the creatures in efforts to save their comrades, but none appeared from the caverns and annihilated every one of the glandelinians who happened to be there killing exactly over one thousand six hundred glandelinians.

The plangiglooman creatures had evidently seen the glandelinian glandelinians come there with the children, and so though they had not appeared to resent the massacre done to them in particular nevertheless did neatly and easily prevent a massacre of children. The creatures however were unable to free the children from the trees, as a larger force of glandelinians near by kept on firing heavy volleys in order to hold the creatures at bay, but notwithstanding the rain of bullets violet and her sisters freed the children one by one, darting from tree to tree between volleys, and after sustaining about thirteen slight wounds had saved the children whom the plangiglooman creatures had foiled beneath their wings to prevent the hail of bullets from hitting any of the rescued children. These plangiglooman creatures had not seen violet and her sisters before, and so were astonished to see the bravery of these beautiful children, and how when they themselves dared not face that storm of bullets, rescued the children from the trees when death threatened them at every second. None of the plangiglooman creatures were old enough yet to stand up before a hail of bullets without being wounded, and so when the glandelinians in the distance had started their withering fire, had been unable to approach the trees. The fire however was not well aimed and so none of the rescued children had been hit. But nevertheless violet and her sisters had to hide for two days in one of the caverns to prevent themselves from being captured by the foe who were scouring the region for them, and they did not dare venture out until a party of Angolians two hundred strong came within the region and escorted them home. The big plangiglooman creatures had went to the sea in quest of food for their young and thus the reason that none of the big ones were there at the time. Plangiglooman creatures at other sections however had not been isolated, and so not such trouble had been incurred at least by the glandelinians. As long as the creatures were left alone, then also would the glandelinians be left alone.

It had also happened that one day after that violet and her sisters had been spying on the enemy in one of the only ways. They unfortunately had to be discovered by one of the glandolintian officers who had recognized them despite their disguise, and so they had a thrilling time in escaping. They had created a noise in their escape by knocking down a number of tents when discovered shot up the main hall of pavements, and then left the camp by a rear way pursued by a large party of glandolintian gargolians on horseback.

It did seem evident that they could not escape for the glandolintians were on horseback and they were not. The gargolians were steadily gaining on them and were about to overtake them, when all of a sudden there was a rush of some body in the air, and before the pursuers there barred their way a great powerful pebbon who menaced the glandolintians with fierce faces, and grins and wings several of their horses who happened to come too near being unable to stop the creature having arrived so suddenly. Violet and her sisters were no doubt equally as astonished to see so huge a creature and did not know what to make of its appearance. They had seen the pebbon before but none like this one. It had the appearance of the one who had attacked joice and Jemio in the pasture but was so huge that it was not so.

The colors however were the same though the tankorhorians on the head was longer and its arms were so long that it made the creature a formidable thing. Its wings shaped exactly like a dragon but was of many colors and had barons of great length. The gargolians were awed at the appearance of the gigantic pebbon but nevertheless were defiant and were for continuing on after the surprised little girls, but their two leaders were not fool fools and said:

"Do you damn fools want to commit a suicide. We can't battle this warrenture and to do so will mean our annihilation. Back and leave the spies go."

Some of the glandolintians were very reluctant to obey the command but then as the plengiglemonian creature stopped making faces, and assumed a very menacing attitude and started to unfurl one of its wings with the intention of striking a blow the glandolintians wisely wheeled their horses, and retreated swiftly back to where they came. The plengiglemonian creature watched them successfully until they were out of sight, and then flew away without uttering a sound. Violet and her sisters knew that the creature had interfered for their sake and were very grateful. This happened on an early morning. Toward noon when they again took the nerve to approach the enemy's camp they however did not enter but watched things at a safe distance.

A large squadron of gargolians however from a high vantage hill had viewed the approach of the vivian girls and had started on in different directions with the intention of surrounding the little girls before they discovered their presence and then have them before they could get away. The ruse worked so far as it goes but just when the glandolintians thought they had the little girls in their grasp a small plengiglemonian creature of a tankorhorian type swooped down and after scattering the glandolintians by making several charges, in which there was great confusion of horses running this way and that the creature held the glandolintians back until violet and her sisters effected their escape. None of the glandolintians however were injured in this fray with the young tankorhorian as they had not been foolish and so did not dare to make any resistance which they knew would have resulted with serious consequences.

During their concentration toward the christian armies at pig girl-knool the glandolintians had also made many forays. At first the forays were made on the smaller towns near pig girl-knool, but finally the enemy raiders got so nervous as to dare to enter the very christian lines by causing exciting a disturbance and capturing men and provisions besides, driving off severely.

hundreds, and burning all the outposts near the main camp, and setting hundreds of tents on fire by fireballs, besides also exploding ammunition houses, and blowing up gun emplacements. This surprising foray caused considerable excitement among the main camp which had at first suspected that it was a sudden attack upon the line. The enemy in this raid had captured over two thousand men and over four thousand horses. About two hundred were killed, and twenty hundred wounded in the fray proceeding the raid on the enemy's side, while the christian losses was only a total of three hundred killed and slightly wounded.

It is however a good reason for the Angelintians for it kept them more on the watch hereafter and they hardly allowed themselves to be surprised again.

Before concentrating near the christian lines at the city of little girl-knool the enemy had made long and tedious marches, and so were not quite ready to begin a battle right away. Nevertheless after four weeks of marching the enemy generals decided to break these two towns before launching their main attack on the christian line itself. General Evans while the severe headwind had been going on took a detail of Abblemians to deliver a number of messages to other christian generals who were preparing for the coming battle storm. General Morgan and Colonel Evans established an advance message center near the glandolintian positions in the great pine woods. The messages which were given to the bearers were to be delivered to different locations. Two days when the bombardment had grown worse and the region was bombarded by a hail rain of shells and high explosives so many orders came to christian officers, and from one to another that nearly all the dispatch carriers were on different errands except Evans and the general.

General Evans decided to dispatch a most important message messager himself and so messenger captain Brown he said:

"Captain Brown take this message to the main battalion headquarters of the 34th Infantry. This is important message, and it must be delivered at once. And as there is no one else to go you will have to go. The situation is too dangerous to send the vivian girls, or even Gertrude Angelina brave as they are."

The colonel too took the message saddled his horse, and galloped off. The day was rainy and a heavy mist settled over all caused by the smoke of bursting shells in the distance. Before he came to a place where the trails crossed the colonel had many narrow escapes from ambushes, and six times was vigorously pursued by gargolians on horseback. Then reaching the cross trails he saw a military police. The colonel knowing him to be an Angelintian stopped his horse and asked him how far the place was where he was to go with the important message.

The M.P. told him to be very careful as the enemy was everywhere looking out for message carriers, and for spies, and even the vivian girls known as violet and her sisters, and to take the trail toward the left toward Battalion headquarters. After going on for a certain distance the colonel came in range of the heavy shell fire. Never before had there been such a din and only god could have caused a thunderstorm to make so much thunder as the shells did. The shells began falling right and left in perfect whizz-bang whizz bang and detonational crashes that was enough to split the eardrums of the biggest giant in any existence, enough to deafen even a good size plengiglemonian creature for life. Suddenly above the din someone shouted.

It was another Abblemian M.P.

"For god's sake colonel do you know where you are going?"

He said:

"Yes" stated the colonel. "I have an important message to take to battalion headquarters."

"Well" replied the M.P. "You cannot go any further on your horse in this reeking inferno of noise and smoke."

The colonel said something else, and then being instructed to leave the horse with the M.P. he did so. The shells were falling quite rapidly, and it did seem that here and there every ten times a second a great eruption of a volcano had suddenly broken forth. The colonel did admit to himself that he was really scared, so he told the M.P. that if he did not return by morning to take his horse back and tell Evans that he was on his way to heaven. The colonel took up his journey again. After he had gone several hundred yards he began to grow more uneasy fearing that he had passed by the headquarters. By this time bullets from bursting shrapnell were pepper ing against the trees and bushes just in his face. So the colonel dropped on his hands and knees. A few hundred yards further on he came to the headquarters. The general who happened to be present was surprised to see the colonel.

"How in the world did you get here through a hell that inferno?" he asked. "Didn't you know that the glandolintians are trying to unload an great number of ammunition dumps on us to night?"

"General Johnston said with surprise:

"You can't possibly go back until this barrage is over."

But orders were orders and the poor colonel had to go back and report whether the order had been carried out or not. So he proceeded to start back on his hands and knees over the headquarters, until safely past the zone of shrapnell fire. He hesitated not thought of what general Johnston had told him. He came to the conclusion that the good general had made a mistake that the enemy were trying to send over to the christian lines all the ammunition factories they had in hell itself besides in their lines instead of a few dumps. Nevertheless he safely reached the lines.

Indeed the bombardment of the cities of big and little girl-kill was a liberal infusion of armed maddened violence for the distance of twenty seven miles, the air for nearly seven days and nights without one moment's intermission being fairly split by the terrific crash and rumble of artillery and explosions of shells which sounded like thousands of drummers rolling on two drums at once as fast as they had it in their power. The din was fairly wild, and was only a forerunner of the terrific conflict that was sure to come.

At a safer distance from the region of the fierce bombardment which had continued until the outbreak of the general glandelinian attack, violet and her sisters had went out alone to see if they could find out some thing important about the enemy, whose actions during the bombardment was and still was very suspicious..... They had not gone far when they came to a sandy stretch of ground near the nor norma run river bordered by great woods and high hills on either side. From here a good view of the enemy's lines could be perfectly obtained, and so jennie and Angeline decided to climb one of the mounds which was slightly bordered by woods, and underfoot of every description. Angeline who as accident was some feet ahead of her sister, then taken by an enemy of by mistake a small young tankorhorian plengiglomennan creature suddenly appeared from ambush and hit poor Angeline on the right foot, and roared terribly. The winged serpent struck her on the right foot the fearful fangs piercing her shoe and tearing and lacerating the flesh. It was only too late that the creature discovered the mistake, as it had been too quick in its attack to see that it was a little girl and not a glandelinian soldier whom it had really been laying for. The creature apologized but did not think it itself as could do anything for her. The nearest doctor within the vicinity who knew about the poisons of these kind of creatures creatures was over three hundred miles away, and none were in the christian lines who knew how to do anything for her. None of the little girls had any means of emergency about them for treatment at hand, and the sorrowful creature knew that his mistaken victim must devise some means of cauterizing the wound or die in the most horrible agony alone there with only her sisters. The creature himself prop so promptly slashed the joint with his tankorhorian making the wound more larger which was compelled to bleed freely. The shoe had been removed by one of her sisters, and after allowing the wound to bleed for a time the creature advised her to use some powder and sear the wound which would get all of the poison out before it took any effect. This was a horrible ordeal for Angeline but then to save herself it must be done so bravely she opened a shotgun cartridge, poured one fourth dr. of powder into the bleeding wound and calmly touched a match to it. The resulting puff of fire seared the flesh for several inches about the wound and cauterized it thoroughly. Angeline almost fainted when the powder went off because she could not remember anything that happened during the next few minutes.

The creature however helped her back to the christian lines and the doctors who treated the case at the relieving army hospital declared that this desperate treatment had without question saved the life of the brave little Vivian girl. Providing if one had the nerve to do it, no more effective cauterization of the wound could have been used they said. Angeline was made slightly ill, due chiefly to the nervous shock of her experience but before the battle itself came about she had been well on the road of recovery, with only a small scar on her foot as a reminder of it in the future.

It had happened that at this point some glandelinian soldiers had seen the tail of the young plengiglomennan creature extending from some bushes the creature having been nibbling on berries at the time and the mischievous scoundrels had fastened the end of it to the ground with a bayonet and then before the creature could do anything had tied the smaller part of the tail into a knot. By frantic efforts the creature had managed to get free and undo the knot but enraged over the pain it had suffered, the creature had expected that the glandelinians would return, and so laid in ambush with the intention of springing upon them and biting them to death for revenge. It happened to be hiding just at the point where Angeline and Gertrude were heading for and not too, looking to see who was coming made the attack without warning, and so had bitten her on the foot before it could control itself after immediately seeing the mistake.

The creature was a small angel winged tankorhorian and the vivian girls could have proved that its whole length was over fifty feet and that its body itself was over seven feet, wide, while the tail was only three at its greatest. It had been a very pretty one and had all the colors the artist knew on its body alone besides the wings and legs.

It was more astonishing to the creature for it had no idea whatever that any children had been so near in the neighborhood, and especially the little Vivian girl, whom nearly all plengiglomennan creatures in existence may have heard or learned about. Had it known that there were two little children approaching it would not have been so hasty but then it had no idea at all and as their steps were or had been so cautious and stealthily the creature has had felt sure that some glandelinians had seen him and were approaching on the quiet to do further mischief. So not daring to take any chances it had struck before it realized what it had done. No serpent of any kind, not even the dreaded Gobra is half as poisonous as any of the plengiglomennan creatures, and only most of them alone can do some good to a person or creature in case of accident accidental biting. Cauterizing was the only quickest means, and sometimes it does happen that the poison would work too quite quick for even that. General Vivian who has had heard of the occurrence had been startled, and wondered how it could be that even little children could be mistaken as an enemy so easily. He especially when the creatures are said to have such telescopic eyes. But then the creature had sprung before it used its eyes and so this the accident was unavoidable and the creature was not to blame. The cowardly glandelinians who had committed the deed had not dared to return when especially they even heard that the creature had been laying in wait for them, and had nabbed one of the vivian girls by mistake. The creature however remembered them and would not give up. It was still more aroused over the mistake, and decided to pay the glandelinians dearly for both. It had hovered for a long time above the enemy's camp until it spotted the wicked glandelinians who had committed the mischief, and then it followed them wherever it went with its far reaching vision eyes, and then when they were somewhat parted from the larger mass of men it descended lower and lower in swooping circles and, then before any one had known what was to happen, swooped down upon the glandelinians like a screaming cyclone, and tore them to pieces before their comrades could rush up to their aid. It held the others at bay by loud roaring, and by displaying all its offensive and defensive armour, and by flourishing its tail in every direction besides threatening to strike right and left with its wings, and thus by holding them at bay it managed to get away before the glandelinians could fire one single volley. It is never wise to do anything rashly to a plengiglomennan creature for it never gives up until it ruins and destroys the offenders. The glandelinians had many lessons on this case and still still were not made the wiser for it.

In the meantime the fierce bombardment, had caused the distant forest to burn, and though for some days there had been signs of peculiar smoke within six miles of the entrenched christian lines and the soldiers had talked of fire casually there was for a while none near enough to cause any actual alarm or concern. The day however came when the bombardment had increased with redoubled fury when the smoke was thicker and at night amid the distant flashes of hundreds of thousands of shells per hour which made the scene like the lightning of a very thunderstorm the christian guards could catch a glimpse of another kind of glow more ruddy and red than the bursting of shells, and the guards became suspicious of fire. The wind had rose to a gale from the southwest, and by the next morning the sun was hid hidden by a thick gray mantle of smoke. Ashes was falling calmly and the guards and sentries, warned off by officers and generals, and men that it would be better to send out more men to fight the conflagration for though the fire was checked toward the christian centre the wind nevertheless was growing in force, and one could never be sure as more forest fires at different quarters was starting on account of the bombardment..... Most of the soldiers relieving a warning worked through the thick brush and shrubbery ploughing strips in front of the christian lines, the fire fighters remaining close ready for an emergency. Ammunition stores were removed to safer quarters, and as the wind picked up more steadily and the smoke grew more dense more men were detailed to go out and combat the advancing conflagration..... The falling ashes which had lasted for two days grew to a continual shower of small smoking and blazing brands. Buckets were filled with water, all the army fire departments were out, and general Evans himself was continually stationed on the roof of his big headquarters to watch for sparks that might mean real danger. The danger of the nearest of the conflagration was still more stronger as the wind grew steadily to a screaming gale and carried heat.

Three days of desperate fighting had no effect in the conflagration and soon some of the fighters came back.

"The wind has got the best of us back yonder!" said the leader of the fire fighters. "Got plenty of water for your building? We'll make a stand at your fire breaks and the roads here. We ought to be able to check it."

For the Angelinian soldiers there was indeed confusion and growing anxiety. A terrific forest fire was approaching their lines, and also it was learned that fire was about on both sides of the christian armies, that the whole country was becoming a sea of fire, and that the enemy bombardments had grown worse and was reaching a better range and committing in capable damage within the christian lines. By the next morning the sky far in the distance was full of smoke thunderheads of many various colors, and the crackle of fire could be plainly heard as it licked toward the christian lines through the timber.

At this location another kind of small plengigloomean creature had swooped down upon the christian lines to rest and had noticed the fire storm approaching, and was surprised to see so much fire out of its place in the woods and grassy plains. Officers and generals guarding their headquarters were calling for more water, large d forces of christians were falling back to save their ammunition, terrific explosions were starting, and crashing with no many reports as could be counted only by the angels in heaven, several headquarters were catching on fire and the excitement increased. The plengigloomean creature had just settled down among the nearest mound formally abandoned by the retreating division of christians when a half hour passed and a guards voice was heard lifted, not a word of command, but in a cry of fright, a cry of alarm. It was a nonchalant sentinels voice and he ran toward the house calling:

"Generals, everybody a larf large force of glandelinians are advancing advancing through the woods which are not yet as yet burning."

One of the generals half fell, half jumped from the roof. Then real confusion as a great explosion rent the air and poured a storm of debris and twice upon the whole region. Danger to the house was forgotten, there was running about, the sounds of firing, a shrill calling, and the bang, bang, bang, of more terrific explosions.

In the meantime the plengigloomean creature had detected a scent scent that was suspicious to him. Slowly he circled about nose to the ground sniffing sneezing slow and impatiently. His long tail moved and stilled as he shoved his long nose hard into the earth one of his big paws uplifted and wings ruffled and half opened displaying magnificent colors. He had it and felt like letting out a signal roar then stopped short. He moved on again swung back sniffed again went forward tentatively then faster, then stiffened, and then with a yelp it raced toward the mark. The creature went to the left along the sandy trail nose went finally low, flourishing and coiling tail indicating his varying successes. Now he went forward at a swift rush tearing through brush and undergrowth as if it was only grass again they stopped again he stopped, and made large circles.

Once the creature lifted his head and blinking stinging eyes and listened a long interval. On down the road and above bushes and under growth with the smoke biting into the delicate nerves of his nostrils making it harder for him to pick up the scent hatless rising where he lost it, whirling in delight when he found it again. The air all around was hot and growing still hotter, and to his right sounded a loud popping, a snapping and a rising and falling matter. The plengigloomean creature stopped suddenly and peered into the smoke screen. He saw tongues of dull flames leap up and a moment another snort. The wind was blowing from the fire through that undergrowth faster than a deer could run.

To the plengigloomean creature it was fire out of place again and he gave a low howl. However he shoved his muzzle again into the road and removed his way. The fire crept closer to the road. It was harder for the plengigloomean creature to make his scent function, for it became high pain to inhale that biting vapor, and that which he sought became fainter and fainter. Still he went on flying at times to avoid the flames turning his face to right and left and snarling viciously as every creeping squadron of glandelinians he saw running through the smoldering woods at seeing his approach. He sneezed and coughed again, his tail at times flourished in the air and sometimes to avoid the blistering draft that bore on him he kept his belly close to the ground. At times he was forced to use his nose to brush aside the pomery dust before he could reach the scent but he always found it, it always went down back the rear end never ventured across the ruts. And then the plengigloomean creature stopped turning half around as from a blow. The road veered to the right toward the fire, and a racing wall of flames a hundred feet leaping up the trees and heaven, to the very tops had crossed it, and below the smoke and flames from burning brush and dead leaves, and grass was a night to make the fiends run. There would be no scent there here the plengigloomean creature could go no farther.

He backed holding his head high, eyes squinted wings open, working his mouth. The stray child he had gone after had gone that way he knew, and that the fire had followed.

And then his ears went up to catch a faint sound that had come to him above the noise of wind and flames. He cocked his head to listen and his whole body trembled as if from cold wind. His ears twitched in effort, it came again louder between gusts of wind, and with a frenzied yelp the plengigloomean creature rose into the air charged through the impenetrable barrier of leaping flames, and though for a moment there was singing fire all about him he was not burned enough to render himself helpless, and though the sand was scorching hot, and sprinkled with flames that blazed he managed to continue onward. The air he breathed scalded throat and lungs, and those thousands of scattered brands which he trod upon as he went blindly forward almost seared his feet. The smell of his bentened scales and burning and singing hair of his ears and whiskers was the only thing his nose could detect now. But somewhere down there, somewhere in or near that fire, he had heard the cry of the child, and the plengigloomean creature had worked his flighting pride up. His eyes ran water and he could hardly see. He could feel the heat beating upon him from either side until it seemed to almost melt his scales and bake his very horns, and once when the road went through a cut he again wallowed and flew through flames until the pain of his blistering belly belly wrung a cry from him. But again he heard that sound nearer and yet again and as the road swung to the left, freeing its one flank from the sea of fire he saw with his tortured eyes hands to her face screaming shrilly a little girl her clothes smoking and half blazing was running forward tendrils of flames licking at her dress and waist staggering in the loose sand, and as the creature tried to grasp the child she stumbled and fell face in the deep rut, and made no effort to rise though hot smoke and flames was within inches of her yellow head. She lay there screaming beating her small fists into the earth. The creature muzzled her, growled and looked about taking an instant to bite savagely at a glandelinian who had suddenly appeared through the smoke endeavoring to bayonet the child. Seeing the creature the glandelinian retreated and the creature endeavored to shove his nose into the child's neck and licked frantically her singed skin, and then yelped again dancing about and flourishing her wings a his wings at a party of glandelinians who were attacking him with an intention to get at the child mauling them to death and fanging several who did not get away after being struck down. More fire was smoldering through the dead grass right up to the road. Down yonder also it was crossing, a surge of glandelinians with flaming brands endeavoring to make it worse so the child could perish before the plengigloomean creature could save her. The plengigloomean creature bared his teeth at the oncoming menace and dived forward but the glandelinians after trying to fight it back and after being almost maimed from the blows of its wings and fearing its deadly bite bent no hasty retreat. Then the creature quieted. Tentatively quite slowly except for the frantic thrashing of his tail he managed to fasten his teeth in the child's clothes close to the back, but working cautiously for a hold that would not nip the flesh, then he clut his jaws growled at more approaching glandelinians and backed away, dragging the child out of the road. The child terrified at seeing the huge creature and thinking it was a dragon protested. She struck and kicked, and screamed, but the plengigloomean creature did not desert. It was his sixty thousand pounds against the child's small weight, and the child who was weakened by the heat and smoke, could not struggle hard. A score of yards at a time, a few furlongs or two. He had to hold the youngsters head high he knew so she could breathe. It was the maximum maximum test for the child's splendid neck already singed by the flames and also shoulder muscles, her feet slipped and slid on the slick dry moss as she struggled to get away from the rescuing creature, but the plengigloomean creature kept a firm hold, as the fire was now coming still more faster and the roar of flames and burning trees and wind was becoming fairly deafening. The plengigloomean creature did not take the road back as it would have been folly. That went through or at least paralleled the fire storm. He struck away from it his sense of direction leading him through the brush toward the distant christian lines angling away from the worse heat and flames. But so slowly for his burned feet stung and started as he worked them furiously in the process and to fly in the woods was impossible as the trees were all aflame above and he would surely burn the child if not himself. The burned clothing tore as he grasped for a firmer hold, snarling at more glandelinians who came to oppose him but who retreated at the warning, eyes on the licking tangles of flames that danced along, cutting down his lead.

The little girls soon became stiff and unresponsive from the racking strain as she still endeavored to get away. The creature still backed, and backed, crawling about tree trunks, so slowly sacrificing so many precious yards. He coughed, choked and gagged, and his teeth were forced apart from the paroxysms. He however kept a grip on his small burden as if it were a berry, and when through less burning strips more glandelinians appeared he growled and flourished his wings and tail furiously, his tail whipping back and forth keeping the vigorous glandelinians at bay. The child's breath became a constant hoarse sobbing the child choking from the thick smoke. Where the creature had made yards, it seemed now he only made inches. Time and again glandelinians tried to interfere, and he bit and squatted, and pulled himself backwards out of their way, and at times struck a fiercer blow with his tail all most hitting the glandelinians as the blow tore down trees and brush. Finally Angolinians appeared and drove off these glandelinians. The creature was spotted by the Angolinians one who lifted the sobbing child, while the office officer stopped to see how the creature was.

The creature was led to the lines, and his burns were treated. The fight against the flames continued for several days until finally a terrific thunderstorm came to add to the din of the continual bombardment and the flames were quite put out of a commission by the fierce downpour of rain. Thus it shows how a plenglovesman creature will risk anything to save the life of a human flower which it adores better than any man or woman can adore the most costly and precious jewel.....

At other locations greater forest fires had been caused by the bombardment and when the storm had ceased, about three days later the forest fires that had swept the former places were renewed with greater fury and for miles and miles frightful seas of flames dashed forth like a hellish infernal regions. The Angolinians were greatly terrified and excited over this sight, and all the efforts of the fire fighters to stop its wild progress seemed in vain. Horror and apprehension seized many of the christian generals as they saw their divisions almost surrounded within two days on every side by the most furious sea of flames and seas of smoke combined. The generals saw nothing else to do but to withdraw their forces before they were encircled by the flames and so the retreat was effected until the christian divisions had retreated a considerable distance and renewed their intrenching at portions where no forest fires could reach for the present.

In the meantime a traitor had been discovered and persecuted by the Angolinians and fearing that he might again be seized by the christians he had run away as fast as he could but had unintentionally reentered the christian lines. Exhausted from running and tortured by the pains of his wounds he was scarcely able to drag his charred body any farther when he saw before him a magnificent, edifice, which he believed was the headquarters of one of the main christian generals. He entered through an open doorway expecting to find a place to hide himself, but he was startled by the dazzling beauty of seven little girls who immediately threatened to oppose his entrance, and whose beauty his eyes could scarcely bear. The children to his appearance were almost of heavenly beauty and they were surrounded by some of their best friends. He at once recognized the daughters of general yivian, violet and her sisters as he heard about them or commonly known as the yivian girls. The escaped spy and glandelinian traitor cast himself on his knees before the beautiful little girls and implored the little girls with tearful eyes to take him under their protection, that he might not again be placed into such terrible danger which he had now just escaped, and to be saved from being arrested by the Angolinians as a spy..... But also to his dismay he beheld in the beautiful countenance of the seven yivian girls an expression of indignation and discontent, and soon heard from violet's lips the words:

"Who is this bold glandelinian intruder who dares to appear without invitation in this my home. See how blackened he is from smoke and burned by fire. And how come he has two bullet wounds. No doubt he is one of those glandelinian spies who stole his way out of reach of his pursuers. As the glandelinians have no mercy to children, and not even for me I saw away with him out of my sight, bring him to the guards, and have him tried as a spy, where he deserves death even forever."

These terrible words crushed the glandelinian youth and in despair he cried for mercy, but the yivian girls turned their faces away and showed themselves inexorable. Then from the many children rescued from the foe who happened to be around violet and her sisters at that time three of the best stepped forward cast themselves down before the yivian girls and implored mercy for the youthful glandelinian sinner who in his wretchedness had taken refuge to them.

"How this hapless glandelinian may take refuge to us after he has been one among many of our most desperate enemies and persecutors." Jemile replied. "And after he deserves and has already felt the fires of hell in that smothering forest fire, but when has he ever been good to us, when has he ever refused to allow his comrades to massacre children, or shown the least devotion to the good ones in heaven? Shall I and my sisters protect one who within so many months and for three years has committed so many and such abominable offenses against us, and who so insolently despised and offended the good Lord whom we love and adore more than we can anybody else? Away with him from my sight. Take him to the christians who are after him."

Once more the modulators implored the mercy of violet and her sisters, they pleaded his youth and experience, or inexperience, the snares of temptations, his youthful passions which caused his wickedness against the good Lord, and his recent cruelty to them and other children. Taught by this terrible experience he certainly would give up his vices for the rest of his life he devoted to even them in love and gratitude, and serve God and the Blessed Mother most zealously. "In such a manner they pleaded.... Amid sobs and tears the glandelinian youth affirmed the words of his small intercessors and promised to change his life and dedicate his services entirely to God and the Blessed Virgin to his very end, and refrain from the cruelties to children, and even them in the future. Finally the countenances of violet and her sisters brightened, and they promised him pardon and protection, gave him their blessing and said:

"We accept thee as our friends go in peace, the Angolinians will not allow any one of the persecutors to molest you but ever keep faithfully the promise you have just made and refrain from the glandelinian service here after."

Several days before the battle of Pig Girl-moat, began millions of the Angolinian and soldiers had attended the masses in the christian armies, and also violet and her sisters, their friendly generals and general Evans and Jack Evans also. The Priest who said the mass which violet and her sisters heard was a good preacher and he said a good deal on the scene of our terrible torments when he was scourged by the wicked enemies in pilate's grand palace. His words went thus:|||||||

"The devotion to the Passion of our Lord, is the most ancient, the most natural and most salutary devotion; desired by Jesus Christ himself, fervently loved by all the devout souls, and attentively practiced by all the Saints. Devout contemplation of the Passion of Christ unites us with God, wounds hardened hearts, and kindles the most zealous. Frequent remembrance of Christ's Passion nourishes and maintains devotion, enriches us with eternal treasures, leads to the summit of all virtues, and gives us the assurance of final perseverance..... The remembrance of our suffering Savior compels all the demons to flight with great terror. Nothing is more salutary than daily to consider how much the God-man has done for us especially for all of us who are now fighting his enemies for his and also our own cause..... To meditate on the sufferings of Christ is true wisdom. Herein are the riches of salvation and the fullness of merit, herein we find sweetest consolation and most salutary compunction..... Therefore be loved soldiers of Christ! Christ, who no doubt will soon fight the enemy once more and drive him off as St. Michael drove off the demons, during the following holy Lenten season take to heart the sufferings of a God, the tortures which He endured for love of you. May take in the sufferings now. One of the principal sources of our sanctification is the tender and compassionate remembrance of our Saviors sufferings. Let your hearts be inflamed with love as you reflect on these passages from the saints who had deeply engaged the sufferings of Christ upon their souls."

"Then Pilate took Jesus and scourged him..... St. Thomas of Jesus thus leads the contemplating soul into the martyrdom of our Lord scourging! Come beloved soul, with a contrite contrite heart, and behold Jesus, thy bridegroom. See how He, the glory of heaven, is delivered into the vile hands of infamous wretches, that they may vent on him all their rage and malice. See how these blood thirsty executioners have been given the power and permission to bruise most unmercifully this pure virginal body, and to shed his precious blood. See how willingly and humbly the Lord of Lords surrenders himself and submits to these godless wretches who are wretched no more better off in their wickedness than the glandelinians who are entranced before you now."

How he permits them to wreak upon them all their wickedness and cruelty, how he becomes obedient to the heavenly Father even unto death. Never did he open his sacred lips to revile or complain; never did he stretch his hand to avenge himself; never did his countenance betray him the least anger or indignation; but with all patience he surrendered his body to the blows of these beastly executioners.

Touching words of St Bernard.....

The compassionate heart of Saint Bernard melts with pity as he contemplates the merciless scourging of our blessed Lord and gave Savior Jesus Christ. The Holy Lamb of God.....Scourging was a punishment inflicted only on slaves. Our loving Savior desired to assume not merely the form of a servant and subject himself to the will of another, no, He wished to appear even as a bad servant, to be punished with lashes of the scourge, thus to endure the punishment deserved by man who had become the slave of sin.

"The wicked have wrought upon my back, they have lengthened their iniquity." Ps. cxxviii. As a blacksmith melts with all his might the fiery iron on the anvil, so did the tortuous torturers strike our innocent Lord, causing his most sacred blood to flow in streams and spurt into the air. Ah how agonizing, think you, did this sacred blood flow that torn and mangled body, purpling the floor of Pilatus hall. Ah with what fury inconceivable of the gnashing evil does he think you, and with what flaming rage did those low degraded barbarians scourge our sweet Jesus, who had come to deliver us from the everlasting scourge.!!!

St Alphonsus cried out;

"On my God, already the cruel torture begins. Come O ye angels of heaven. Be present at this painful scene. And if it is not granted you to deliver your King from the cruel maltreatment inflicted on him by man, come at least to weep over him..... And thou beloved soul come in spirit to be present at this abominable heart rending treatment of thy Savior. Consider how thy beloved Jesus stands with bowed head, and down cast eyes. Blushing from shame He avails this frightful torture.... See how these men stern fiends, with their infernal scourges pounce like mad dogs upon the innocent victim. The innocent Lamb. See how this one strikes him in the breast that one his back, another his side, and another his limbs. Vain, his sacred head, his beautiful countenance, does not escape the blows. Ah, already his Divine blood flows down on all sides; already the scourges, and the arms of the hangmen are stained with this adorable blood, already it has besprinkled the pillar and the ground beneath. Alas, his whole body is being lacerated, each follows each, wound up a wound. A single blow endured by this God man would have been enough to atone for the sins of the whole world; but this did not suffice for Jesus. He desired in expiation of our sins, to be wounded and crucified, to be torn and mangled from head to foot, so that there remained no sound spot upon his sacred body. O Son of God. Thou great lover of my soul. How is it possible that Thou Lord of infinite Majesty could so much love a despicable creature like me, that Thou wouldst submit to so many tortures in order to deliver me from the well deserved punishment punishments. A God is scourged. It was a greater miracle for a God to endure the least blow than if all men and angels had been annihilated. O my soul. Wilt thou be one of those who look with indifference on thy God torn with scourges? Reflect on his sufferings, but at all more on the love with which thy sweet Lord submits to so excruciating torture for my sake. In his scourging Jesus certainly thought of thee. Oh God, hadst Thou borne but a single stripe for my sake, I should burn with love for thee and exclaim: A God suffered to be struck for my sake. But behold O immeasurable love, for the atonement of my sins He permits his whole entire sacred body to be mangled. How touching are these affections of the great and compassionate St Alphonsus. In addition we give a vision of the scourging which is capable to move the soul to its inmost depths. The vision is taken from the books on the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ according to the well known revelations of Anna Catherine Emmerich, a book which can never be too strongly recommended, and which is suited like none other for pious reading during the Holy days of Lent.

Pilate the base, wavering judge, had several times pronounced the contradictory words:

"I find no cause in him, I will chastise him therefore and let him go. But the clamor of the Jews continued unabated; 'CRUCIFY HIM. CRUCIFY HIM.' Overwhelmed Pilate determined first to try and carry through his own will and ordered Jesus to be scourged according to the Roman fashion. Thereupon while violently thrusting, and beating him with short stout clubs the hangmen led the maltreated, lacerated, mutilated by Savior through the raving, screaming mob, out into the forum, north of Pilatus house, near the guard house, to a pillar which stood here before one of the walls that surrounded the market place. The executioners, throwing their scourges, whips and ropes, down at the foot of the pillar, gave forward to meet Jesus. They were six men, they man, degraded criminals from the vicinity of Egypt, who as slaves and convicts worked here on buildings and canals, and the lowest and vilest of them were employed for such heinous services in the praetorium. These abominable wretches had already at that same pillar, scourged poor sinners to death. There was something beastly, diabolical in their nature, and they appeared half drunk. Although our Lord walked along so willingly they struck him with their fists and ropes, and with furious rage pulled him along to the scourging pillar. The pillar is just high enough for a tall person with outstretched arms to reach its upper circular end, to which is fastened an iron ring, midway at the back of the pillar there are also rings or hooks. It is impossible to express the barbarity with which these raving beasts scourged Jesus on this short rod. They tore from him the monk's mantle of Herod, and also threw our poor Savior on the ground. Jesus trembled and quivered at the sight of the pillar. In palpitating haste he himself removed his garments with his hands, bleeding and swollen from tight binding, while they continually struck and jerked him about. He prayed and pleaded so touchingly, and for a moment turned his face toward his Mother all torn with grief. She stood with the holy women in a corner of the hall of the market, near the scourging place, and he said turning toward the pillar to cover his nakedness---as he was compelled to even remove his lion cloth; "turn thy eyes away from me." I do not know whether he said this outwardly or inwardly, but I perceived how many understood it; for I saw her that same instant, unconscious and turned aside, drop into the arms of the holy veiled women who surrounded her.

Now Jesus embraced the pillar, and the hangmen laid frightful cursing and jerking, bound his sacred up drawn hands on the top, behind the iron ring on the pillar, and stretched his whole body so far upward that his feet which were tightly fastened to the pillar below could scarcely touch the ground. There stood the Holy of holies in his whole human nakedness with infinite anguish and shame, stretched on the pillar of criminals, while two of the infuriated barbarians began to lash his sacred back upwards and downwards with raving bloodthirstiness. Their first scourges or whips appeared to be made of white tough wood; possibly too, they were of rigid oxen sinews or hard stripes of white leather. Our Lord and Savior the Son of God, true God, and true man, twitched and writhed like a poor worm beneath the lashes of the criminals. He whined and moaned, his clear sweet sounding voice like a loving prayer and exclaiming torture, rang through the hissing blows of the hangmen's lashes. But time and again the holy pitiful benediction bringing peace was smiled up by the yells of the people and of the Pharisees. "Away with him. Crucify him." came the roaring cry from all sides. Pilate was still parleying with the multitude. Whenever he wished to speak, a trumpet was sounded to silence the fierce din and clamor for some moments. And then through the silence were heard the hissing of the scourges, the low lamentations of Jesus, the curses of the executioners, and the blasting of the Pantar Lasha from the pool from where they were being washed which pool lay east of the forum and near the so called Prohibition (sheepgate).

Alongside the guardhouse I saw some infectious youths, almost naked engaged in preparing fresh scourges, while others went to get bundles of the thorns. Some of the hangmen of the high priests were in communication with the scourgers, and secretly bribed them with money. There was a large jug containing a thick red liquor, from which they drank, and became drunk and infuriated. Scarcely had a quarter of an hour elapsed when the first two scourgers ceased their beating and joined two others, whereupon all drank together. The body of Jesus was all covered with brown, blue and red stripes, and his sacred blood trickled down. He trembled and quivered. Scorn and derision resounded from all sides. And now the second pair of scourgers fell with new rage upon Jesus. They had different kinds of whips which were busby, as though made of thorns, and here and there had knots or and spurs fastened in them. Under that their enraged lashes his sacred body were torn open, his blood spurted in a circle, and bespattered the arms of the hangmen. Jesus moaned and prayed and twitched in his agony. The next two hangmen lashed Jesus with the scourges. These consisted of little chains or straps attached to an iron handle with iron hooks on the end. With these they tore whole pieces of flesh and skin from his ribs. Oh who can describe the awful shuddering sight.

Still they had not an inch of outrage. They loosened the cords and turned him up his back to the column. He was painfully drawn together, covered with blood and wounds. His lacerated ribs loomed, and the torn skin of his body covered as coral covered his nakedness. Like furious dogs the executioners heaped blow upon blow. One of them had in his left hand a finer lash wherewith he lashed his face. Not a sound spot was more to be found on his body. He turned his blood-dimmed eyes to the executioners pleading for mercy. But they ragged the more furiously and with ever increasing weakness Jesus cried and groined "woe!" The terrible scourging lasted about three quarters of an hour.....

It was the first time in their little lives that poor Violet and her sisters had ever heard such a sermon especially about the scourging of our Lord and saviour Jesus Christ and they felt as if it was the worse thing that had ever happened, and only, longed bitterly that some pliant, glistening creatures had been there and had interfered. Evans was almost sorrowful that they had heard this sermon and it was very hard for him to cheer them up. Nevertheless he did not try to do much as sorrow over this is worthy and he only loved them all the more.

It was the next day when Colonel,landers came up to general Jack Evans and said;

"Your excellency I've seen something suspicious near the quarters where Violet and her sisters sleep and so on. Near the place just at the door where they come out there has been piled a lot of soggy hay to nearly the height of ten feet, and who ever the man was I do not know but his actions showed him to be a glandelinian and he escaped before I could halt him or fire at him. As I and a company of men had been strolling through the field I had happened to glance over toward their place and after watching for some time saw the man come out of the shed near the building. He was dressed as an angolinian but his notions drew my eyes suspicion right away. But I wished to see proceedings and so did not interrupt."

"Yes but what did the man do Colonel?" Asked Evans.

"I saw him take a pitchfork and dig a large hole in the soggy old hay. Then my suspicions were further aroused when I saw him put a package in the hole and cover it up."

"Did he act more suspicious?" Asked Evans.

"Yes" Answered the colonel. "He glanced around many times, and when ever he saw a number of soldiers come toward him he hid in the hay. In the place and only reappeared when they passed."

"I want you to lead me to the place immediately" Said Evans. "I have an idea that there is something suspicious put in that hay. Maybe something with which to blow up the building and kill Violet and her sisters. I must prevent it before it is too late."

The colonel told him to follow and so off they went toward the building as fast as they could walk a squad of soldiers with pitchforks following.

"That guy was probably one of those glandelinian assassins who who was probably burying a package of dynamite or high explosives in the pile of hay" Said Evans as they neared the point. "It may have been explosives placed that were timed for a certain hour to explode." They soon reached a wall of the building and Evans saw the suspicious hay pile close to the very entrance of the building of which Violet and her sisters are wont to come out.

"There general see" Said the colonel. "That's the pile."

"Oh no that's it." He Exclaimed Evans. "And there is not a soul in sight not even a single guard. That's strange. Come on boys get to work and see what the package is."

The soldiers immediately scurried over to the place and started work on the hay pile throwing the hay into another quarter while Evans who was watching the work said to the colonel;

"When I find this package I'll have it opened and examined." I also hope that the culprit has been captured."

"He was said the colonel and here comes the guy now under the escort of two soldiers."

After the soldiers had been digging among the hay for about two minutes they began all to snarl;

"What the duce is in this hay?" Shouted but its a horrible order.

"And it smells like there is something so dead around here." Said another throwing a fork full of hay across his shoulder."
